Bridging the Information Gap: How Access to Land Contracts Can Serve Community Rights

Lara Wallis
Columbia Law School

Sam Szoke-Burke
Columbia Law School, Columbia Center on Sustainable Investment, sburke1@law.columbia.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarship.law.columbia.edu/sustainable_investment_staffpubs

Part of the Agriculture Law Commons, Environmental Law Commons, Human Rights Law Commons, International Humanitarian Law Commons, International Law Commons, Land Use Law Commons, Natural Resources Law Commons, Securities Law Commons, and the Transnational Law Commons

Recommended Citation

This Memo/Briefing Note is brought to you for free and open access by the Columbia Center on Sustainable Investment at Scholarship Archive. It has been accepted for inclusion in Columbia Center on Sustainable Investment Staff Publications by an authorized administrator of Scholarship Archive. For more information, please contact scholarshiparchive@law.columbia.edu.
BRIDGING THE INFORMATION GAP

HOW ACCESS TO LAND CONTRACTS CAN SERVE COMMUNITY RIGHTS

Land contracts show what commitments a forestry, farming or renewable energy company has made and what the government has said the company can do on the land. These promises define the positive and harmful effects the company’s project could have on community members’ livelihoods and human rights, and on the environment.

Accessing land contracts is a crucial strategy for local organizations. With the contract, organizations can help communities to:

- Understand company and government obligations related to a company project
- Monitor whether those obligations are being fulfilled
- Hold companies and the government to account for bad contracts or for failing to deliver on commitments that are important to communities
What is a Land Contract?
A land contract (also known as an investor-state contract, or a concession agreement) is an agreement between a government and a company that gives the company the right to use certain land for a forestry, farming or renewable energy project. In exchange, the company makes commitments to the government. These commitments are recorded in the contract.

Land contracts can have many drawbacks. They are usually negotiated secretly and may not properly consider local communities—even when laws require that the community participate in the project’s design or in land contract negotiations. Ideally, company operations should be regulated by laws that protect human rights and the environment, rather than governed mainly by contracts. But land contracts are commonly used, so it is important for local communities to access and understand these contracts.

Communities have a right to know the details of the company projects that affect them, and land contracts can be an important source of information. However, communities and the local organizations that support them often cannot access these contracts. This means that there is an information gap that places communities at a disadvantage when trying to protect their rights and interests.

OpenLandContracts.org helps communities bridge the information gap and make the fundamental right of access to information a reality. This growing site collects and displays publicly disclosed land contracts and related documents from a range of countries.

Knowing what commitments the company and the government have made can help communities to defend their rights. The information that you can find in a land contract can help you understand how the project may affect community members’ livelihoods and human rights, and the local environment. These effects can be good or bad. Land contracts may include details regarding:

- When and how the company is required to give information to community members, consult with them and/or obtain their free, prior and informed consent.
- The exact land that the company can use (and the land it cannot use), what it can do on the land, and for how long.
- The amount of other resources, such as water, wood, clay and stones, among others, that the company can use.
- Any payments that the company must make to the community.
- Jobs that must be created for community members or national citizens, and business opportunities that must be created for community members to sell products or services to the company.
- Infrastructure that the company must build and maintain for the community, such as, for example, wells, bridges and roads.
- Skills training that the company must provide to community members.
- The parts of the project land and infrastructure that community members are allowed to access.
- Processes a company must put in place to address community complaints or concerns about its operations.

“Having open access to contracts has the potential to ‘level the playing field’ and address imbalances in knowledge. Knowledge is power!”

Justine Sylvester, Village Focus International, Laos
OPENLANDCONTRACTS.ORG supports your work to defend community rights in many ways:

1. Monitoring
Once you know what a land contract says, you can monitor the actions of the company and the government to see if they are delivering on their commitments. If they are not, your knowledge of what the contract says can strengthen demands that the company or government act responsibly and in compliance with the contract.

2. Scrutinizing government contracting practices
Once you access a contract, you can use OpenLandContracts.org’s guides and comparison tools to check whether or not the government did a good job in negotiating contract terms that protect community rights and the environment.

3. Advocacy
If you find that the company or the government have breached their commitments, or that the contract does not protect community rights, you can use these findings as a basis for advocacy.

“Sometimes people support concessions based on the assumption that they will benefit. However, once they understand the contract, they realize many of the benefits are uncertain. People learn how to ask better questions and demand a seat at the table.”

FRANCIS COLEE, GREEN ADVOCATES, LIBERIA

If the government did not ask enough from a company in the contract, or has included terms that have a negative effect on community rights, you can demand that the government:

- Renegotiate problematic terms.
- Provide opportunities for inclusive and thorough public participation in land contract negotiations and renegotiations.
- Only enter into future contracts on terms that benefit the community and protect the environment.
“[B]uilding the capacity of communities to access and understand contracts has had a powerful effect on developing each community’s advocacy strategy. It is one thing to go to a company and say: ‘we are not happy.’ It is much more effective to say: ‘we are not happy because you have failed to comply with article 3 of this contract.’”

SAMUEL NGUIFFO, CENTRE POUR L’ENVIRONNEMENT ET LE DEVELOPPEMENT, CAMEROON

» If the company is not delivering on its commitments in the contract, you can pressure the company to comply with the contract and ask the government to hold the company to its commitments.

» If a company operates in different countries, you can use OpenLandContracts.org to check if the company often signs contracts with terms that are damaging for human rights or the environment in other countries. If this is the case, you can notify the government and raise awareness about the company’s practices among civil society in relevant countries, and collectively strengthen your advocacy efforts. You can also notify financial institutions, shareholders and other actors who have the power to influence the company’s behavior.

“We use OpenLandContracts.org to review land contracts across the African continent in order to assess provisions that governments have included in their contracts, and to provide guidance on the types of provisions governments in this region should and should not include. It is incredibly useful to have all the contract information in the same place.”

SAMUEL NGUIFFO, CENTRE POUR L’ENVIRONNEMENT ET LE DEVELOPPEMENT, CAMEROON

4. Raising community awareness

Local organizations can use OpenLandContracts.org’s training modules and guides to help community members understand what contracts say. With this understanding, a community can:

» Show the company and government that it knows what the contract says and will not tolerate breaches of the contract or of community rights more generally.

» Prepare to negotiate a social agreement with the company.

» Prepare for when the project reaches the community (if the company has not yet started using the community’s lands and resources).

5. Raising broad public awareness

Land contracts are also relevant to the public at large because they can affect human rights, the environment and the way that money received from the company is distributed. By analyzing contracts from your country, you can identify worrying contracting practices and raise public awareness about them. Awareness raising can encourage public conversations about how the government negotiates land contracts and create pressure for governments to improve how they negotiate with companies!

6. Campaigning for contract transparency

If your government does not disclose contracts, you can use examples of transparent countries from OpenLandContracts.org to support campaigns to disclose land contracts.

Illustrations © Ndine Nwaka, mb: 234 8125768790, +234 8034924215, info@openlandcontracts.org