The Roberts Court and Administrative Law

Gillian E. Metzger

Columbia Law School, gmetzg1@law.columbia.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarship.law.columbia.edu/faculty_scholarship

Part of the Administrative Law Commons, and the Supreme Court of the United States Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarship.law.columbia.edu/faculty_scholarship/2602

This Working Paper is brought to you for free and open access by the Faculty Publications at Scholarship Archive. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty Scholarship by an authorized administrator of Scholarship Archive. For more information, please contact cls2184@columbia.edu.
The Roberts Court and Administrative Law
(Forthcoming, 2018 Supreme Court Review)

Gillian E. Metzger*

Administrative law today is marked by the legal equivalent of mortal combat, where foundational principles are fiercely disputed and basic doctrines are offered up for “execution.”1 Several factors have led to administrative law’s currently fraught status. Increasingly bold presidential assertions of executive power are one, with President Trump and President Obama before him using presidential control over administration to advance controversial policies that failed to get congressional sanction.2 In the process, they have deeply enmeshed administrative agencies in political battles—indeed, for President Trump, administrative agencies are the political battle, as his administration has waged an all-out war on parts of the national bureaucracy.3 These bold assertions of administrative authority stem in part from Congress’s inability to address pressing problems, with political polarization, intense partisanship, and near parity between the main parties often leading to legislative gridlock.4 The contemporary political climate also means that fights over administrative actions have become fierce and unrelenting. Moreover, the combination of these two developments—aggressive administrative advancement of presidential agendas in a deeply partisan and polarized world—has spurred a significant uptick in politically-charged administrative law litigation, epitomized by the dramatic expansion in red state and blue state lawsuits challenging executive branch actions they oppose.5 In addition, conservative groups have put sustained efforts into fostering academic attacks on core features of administrative government, efforts that have provided the intellectual scaffolding for today’s doctrinal disputes.6

* Harlan Fiske Stone Professor of Constitutional Law, Columbia Law School. Special thanks to Jessica Bulman-Pozen, Olati Johnson, Tom Merrill, Daphna Renan, and David Strauss for extremely helpful comments and to Dustin Graber and Charles See for excellent research assistance, including acquiring knowledge of the Chicago citation style.

1 Kisor v Wilkie, 139 S Ct 2400, 2425 (2019).

2 For examples of “bold attempts to accrete executive power” in both the Obama and Trump administrations, see Jerry L. Mashaw and David Berke, Presidential Administration in a Regime of Separated Powers: An Analysis of Recent American Experience, 35 Yale J Reg 549, 550 (2018).

4 See Gillian E. Metzger, Agencies, Polarization, and the States, 115 Colum L Rev 1739, 1748–49, 1757–58 (2015); see also Jody Freeman and David B. Spence, Old Statutes, New Problems, 163 U Pa L Rev 1, 17–63 (2014) (providing detailed examples of how congressional gridlock may prompt agencies to use their authority under preexisting statutes to address newly emerging regulatory challenges).

5 See Lawsuits (State Energy & Environmental Impact Center, July 31, 2019), archived at https://www.law.nyu.edu/centers/state-impact/ag-actions/active-lawsuits (listing 63 active law suit against the Trump Administration with 34 filed or joined by California and 26 by New York); Neena Satija, Texas vs. the Feds—A Look at the Lawsuits (The Texas Tribune, Jan 17, 2017), archived at https://www.texastribune.org/2017/01/17/texas-federal-government-lawsuits/ (highlighting that the state of Texas sued the Obama Administration 48 times during his two terms).

6 See, for example, Jane Mayer, Dark Money: The Hidden History of the Billionaires Behind the Rise of the Radical Right 2–10 (Doubleday 2016) (describing Charles and David Koch’s extensive funding of anti-administrative political organizations).
And, finally, there is the Trump Administration’s emphasis on selecting judges who are receptive to these conservative attacks on administrative governance in court.\footnote{See Jason Zengerie, \textit{How the Trump Administration Is Remaking the Courts} (NY Times Mag Aug 22, 2018), archived at https://www.nytimes.com/2018/08/22/magazine/trump-remaking-courts-judiciary.html (describing the judicial appointment process under Trump and the role played by the Federalist Society).}

A particularly important contributor to administrative law’s contested status is the Roberts Court. The replacement of Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice O’Connor with Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito brought a new skepticism about administrative government to the Supreme Court. Meanwhile, Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas did 180 degree turns in their approaches to administrative law, penning attacks on administrative law decisions they themselves had authored just a few years earlier.\footnote{Compare \textit{Michigan v EPA}, 135 S Ct 2699, 2712 (2015) (Thomas, J, concurring) (\textit{Chevron} deference unconstitutionally requires courts to defer to agencies’ interpretations of ambiguous statutes) with \textit{National Cable & Telecommunications Association v Brand X Internet Services}, 545 US 967, 982–83 (2005) (Thomas, J) (requiring courts to defer to reasonable agency interpretations of ambiguous statutes, even if the court has already interpreted the statute differently). For Justice Scalia’s changed view on his \textit{Auer} opinion, see text accompanying notes 30–33.} Justice Gorsuch’s elevation to the Court added another strident administrative skeptic to the mix,\footnote{\textit{Gutierrez-Brizuela v Lynch}, 834 F3d 1142, 1158 (10th Cir 2016) (Gorsuch, J, concurring) (arguing that \textit{Chevron} deference is unconstitutional).} and by his final term on the Court even Justice Kennedy had joined the ranks of administrative law’s critics.\footnote{\textit{Pereira v Sessions}, 138 S Ct 2105, 2120 (2018) (Kennedy, J, concurring) (finding the “reflexive deference” – from –3524645=—– to be unconstitutional).}

This judicial skepticism of administrative government, which I have elsewhere labeled anti-administrativism, is heavily constitutional, marked by a formalist and originalist approach to the separation of powers, a deep distrust of bureaucracy, and a strong turn to the courts to protect individuals against administrative excess and restore the original constitutional order.\footnote{\textit{Compare Michigan v EPA}, 135 S Ct 2699, 2712 (2015) (Thomas, J, concurring) (\textit{Chevron} deference unconstitutionally requires courts to defer to agencies’ interpretations of ambiguous statutes) with \textit{National Cable & Telecommunications Association v Brand X Internet Services}, 545 US 967, 982–83 (2005) (Thomas, J) (requiring courts to defer to reasonable agency interpretations of ambiguous statutes, even if the court has already interpreted the statute differently). For Justice Scalia’s changed view on his \textit{Auer} opinion, see text accompanying notes 30–33.} Several opinions demonstrated these traits in the lead up to the 2018 Term, from the Court’s decision in \textit{Free Enterprise Fund v PCAOB} striking down double-for-cause removal protection, to Justice Thomas’s concurrence in \textit{Department of Transportation v Association of American Railroads} attacking modern delegation, to Chief Justice Roberts’s dissent in \textit{City of Arlington v FCC} rejecting deference to agency jurisdictional determinations, to the many concurrences in \textit{Perez v Mortgage Bankers Association} calling deference to agency regulatory interpretations into question.\footnote{\textit{Gillian E. Metzger, The Supreme Court 2016 Term—Foreword: 1930s Redux: The Administrative State Under Siege}, 131 Harv L Rev 1, 3–4, 33–46 (2017).} But perhaps the clearest example is the ongoing debate over \textit{Chevron} deference, or the doctrine that a court should defer to a reasonable interpretation of an ambiguous statutory provision offered by the agency charged with its implementation.\footnote{\textit{Chevron v Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc}, 467 US 837, 842–43 (1984). See also \textit{United States v Mead}, 533 US 218, 226–27 (2001) (limiting \textit{Chevron} deference in addition to instances where the agency has the power to issue rules with the force of law and exercised that authority in issuing the interpretation in question).} The most cited administrative law decision for decades, \textit{Chevron} has been under full-blown assault at the Supreme Court since 2015, when Justice Thomas condemned the practice of courts deferring to agency statutory interpretations as violating Article III and creating unconstitutional delegations.\footnote{Michigan, 135 S Ct at 2712 (2015) (Thomas, J, concurring).} Although Thomas made his argument in an opinion concurring in the judgment that no one else joined, by \textit{Pereira v Sessions} three years later there appeared to be at least four justices who considered \textit{Chevron} deference to be constitutionally problematic,\footnote{138 S Ct at 2120–21 (Kennedy, J, concurring), id at 2129 (Alito, J, dissenting) (both voicing concerns with the Court’s treatment of \textit{Chevron}); Gutierrez-Brizuela, 834 F3d at 1154–56 (Gorsuch, J, concurring) (questioning whether \textit{Chevron} violates separation of powers).} and the Court itself has not relied on \textit{Chevron} deference since 2014.\footnote{See \textit{Cuozzo Speed Technologies, LLC v Lee}, 136 S Ct 2131, 2142 (2016) (applying \textit{Chevron} deference to validate Patent and Trademark Office rules for inter parties review).}

Still, a striking feature of the Roberts Court’s anti-administrativism before the 2018 Term was its largely rhetorical character. Although several justices waxed expansively about an out-of-control national bureaucracy, the most dramatic attacks on the administrative state’s constitutionality and administrative law were largely restricted to concurrences and dissents. The occasional majority opinions invalidating administrative arrangements on constitutional grounds were notably narrow, cabining their analysis with carve outs and remedial minimalism.\footnote{See, for example, \textit{Wisconsin Central Ltd v United States}, 138 S Ct 2067, 2074 (2018); \textit{Epic Systems Corp v Lewis}, 138 S Ct 1612, 1630 (2018); see also \textit{Pereira}, 138 S Ct at 2121 (Alito, J, dissenting) (“Here, a straightforward application of \textit{Chevron} requires us to accept the Government’s construction of the provision at issue. But the Court rejects the Government’s interpretation in favor of one that it regards as the best reading of the statute. I can only conclude that the Court, for whatever reason, is simply ignoring \textit{Chevron}”).} And the Court was adept in its avoidance tactics, for example repeatedly determining that statutes were unambiguous and thereby sidestepping the need to take on the debate over \textit{Chevron}’s constitutionality.\footnote{Christopher J. Walker, \textit{Judge Kavanaugh on Administrative Law and Separation of Powers} (SCOTUSBlog, July 26, 2018), archived at https://www.scotusblog.com/2018/07/kavanaugh-on-administrative-law-and-separation-of-powers (summarizing Justice Kavanaugh’s DC Circuit opinions on separation of powers and agency deference).} In short, for all of its alarmism about bureaucrats running amok and assertions that the contemporary administrative state violates the constitutional order, the Roberts Court hadn’t yet pulled back significantly on administrative governance in practice.

Thus, the increasingly burning question was whether the Roberts Court was willing to put its might where its mouth was on administrative law, even at the cost of destabilizing longstanding governance regimes. Or would its anti-administrativism continue to live mainly at the margins, tamping down perceived administrative law excesses without forcing radical changes in administrative law doctrines or received wisdom about the structural constitution? Justice Kavanaugh’s track record on the DC Circuit—the nation’s leading administrative law court—suggested that he would be amenable to further narrowing and retraction in core administrative law doctrines of deference and delegation.\footnote{See, Petition for a Writ of Certiorari, \textit{Kisor v Wilkie}, 18–15, *i (US filed June 29, 2018); Petition for a Writ of Certiorari, \textit{Gundy v United States}, 17–6086, *i (US filed Sept 20, 2017).} Moreover, the Court granted certiorari in several cases that raised pointed challenges to basic administrative law precepts, suggesting that it was finally willing to put its anti-administrativism into action.\footnote{See, for example, \textit{Metzger}, 131 Harv L Rev at 47–48 & n 278 (cited in note 11).}

Yet administrative law’s denouement did not come. After a term rife with important administrative law decisions, established administrative law remains in force, albeit narrowed.
Thus, in Kisor v Wilkie,\(^\text{21}\) the Court did not overturn the Auer doctrine of deference to agency regulatory interpretations, although it tempered such deference in significant ways. Similarly, in Department of Commerce v New York,\(^\text{22}\) the Court ultimately reaffirmed and arguably expanded administrative law’s core requirement of reasoned decisionmaking to include a prohibition on pretextual explanations of agency decisions. In several other cases, the Court hewed to existing administrative law frameworks. The case in which the anti-administrativist view gained the most traction was Gundy v United States,\(^\text{23}\) where four justices signaled sympathy for a full-bore assault on the constitutionality of broad delegations. Even so, a plurality upheld the measure in question applying the Court’s well-established doctrine on delegation, and as of this writing it remains unclear (and in my view unlikely) whether a majority will materialize for a major doctrinal recalibration on delegation that would call the constitutionality of the administrative state into question.

The 2018 Term cases demonstrate that the Roberts Court is deeply divided on administrative law. These divisions track clear ideological lines. Justice Gorsuch emerged as the voice of the four more conservative justices this term, intent on overturning established administrative law doctrines and pulling back on administrative government. Meanwhile Justice Kagan led the four liberal justices in a defensive effort, seeking to deter or at least mitigate the conservative assault. In the middle was Chief Justice Roberts, sharing the conservatives’ suspicion of government and bureaucracy yet resistant to the dramatic disruption and potential institutional costs to the Court that Gorsuch’s approach might yield. The cases, particularly Kisor and Department of Commerce, also illuminate several core analytic themes and tensions in the Roberts Court’s administrative law jurisprudence. These include recently reemerged philosophical disputes over the distinction between law and policy as well as more longstanding constitutional disagreements about separation of powers formalism, functionalism, and minimalism. Another central development is an increased historical focus, a development evident in Roberts Court administrative law opinions from all quarters. This increased historicism surfaced notably in revived debates over the meaning of the 1946 Administrative Procedure Act, with originalist and textualist interpretation of the APA’s text squaring off against a more evolving, common law approach to the statute and administrative law writ large. Although important, these analytic disagreements are unable on their own to explain the direction of Roberts Court administrative law. Among other issues, they map the Court’s ideological divides imperfectly, with some trends spanning both camps and inconsistencies on both sides.

Taking a further step back, two contrasting frames emerge from the Roberts Court’s administrative law opinions from the 2018 Term, building on these analytic tensions. The first is formalist in the extreme, insisting on sharp demarcations among the branches and between law and policy. It is also insistently originalist, condemning contemporary judicial review doctrines as at odds with traditional understandings of the judicial power and the meaning of the APA. With its categorical and uncompromising stance, commitment to limited government and aggressive judicial review, this approach has the potential to radically transform American governance. That seems in part the purpose, as this radical frame is accompanied by deep skepticism about administrative government.

\(^{21}\) 139 S Ct 2400 (2019).
\(^{22}\) 139 S Ct 2551 (2019).
\(^{23}\) 139 S Ct 2116 (2019).
The second frame encompasses justices with a broader range of views about constitutional structure and administrative government. Most are functionalist and accepting of constitutional evolution, but at least the Chief Justice (a sometime adherent) is more formalist and originalist. They also disagree on the extent to which administrative government poses a serious problem at all, and if it does whether the concern is the potential for arbitrary agency action or a politically unaccountable bureaucracy. But what unites them is that they are unwilling to radically disrupt existing governance regimes, at least not all at once. Instead, they share a commitment to addressing whatever problems exist with administrative government by gradually fine-tuning doctrine. The central characteristic of this approach is therefore its incremental, common law character. The impact of this incrementalist approach is harder to discern, given both the variation within its ranks and the longer time-horizon needed to assess incremental change. It also leaves lower courts greater room to apply administrative law as they see fit, which could yield more pullback in administrative law or its continued preservation, depending on the orientations of lower court judges. Like its radical cousin, this incrementalist frame could result in a substantial pullback in administrative power, but it would have this effect through a more subconstitutional and statutory interpretation guise and over a longer period of time.

In assessing the future impact of Roberts Court administrative law, the most important factor may be this tension between radicalism and incrementalism. Which of these analytic frames will ultimately prevail still remains an open question, but incrementalism was plainly the victor in the 2018 Term’s administrative law decisions. That is significant, but should also not obscure that there was unity across the Court in urging greater judicial scrutiny of administrative action. Moreover, despite invocations of the importance of bureaucratic expertise, these decisions share the concerns with unaccountable, aggrandized, and arbitrary administrative power that characterize the Roberts Court’s administrative jurisprudence more widely.

That administrative power is expansive is indisputable, as is the possibility that such power could be abused. Yet the Roberts Court’s portrayal of administrative government is strikingly incomplete. Notably lacking is reference to the ways that the administrative state operates to constrain power, render it accountable, and advance individual liberty. The lack of such an affirmative account reinforces the sense that the goal of Roberts Court administrative law may be to pull back on government for its own sake, rather than to better achieve constitutional values. Absent a more balanced view of the administrative state, the Roberts Court is unlikely to develop a coherent approach to administrative law.

Part I of what follows discusses the 2018 Term’s administrative law cases, looking in detail at the two decisions addressing judicial review of agency decisionmaking, Kisor v Wilkie and Department of Commerce v New York. Part II then elucidates several key analytic tensions underlying these decisions and the Roberts Court’s administrative law jurisprudence writ large, while Part III assesses what the 2018 Term decisions portend for the future of administrative law.
I. Administrative Law in the 2018 Term

Administrative law took center-stage in the 2018 Term. A range of cases presented the Court with opportunities to remake doctrine, opportunities that the Court for the most part declined. In some instances, the Court took a minimalist approach, invoking established doctrine to resolve relatively noncontroversial issues and punting the difficult questions back to the lower courts. In others, the Court engaged more forthrightly with contentious administrative law issues, albeit ultimately sidestepping dramatic changes.

Two administrative law decisions deserve special attention: Kisor v Wilkie and Department of Commerce v New York. Both were prominent cases that centered on the core and much disputed issue of judicial deference to administrative determinations. Both also involved a majority affirming the principle of deference as well as existing deference doctrines, and thus they too are instances in which the Court avoided dramatic change. Together, these two cases offer an illuminating window on recurring themes and tensions in the Roberts Court’s approach to administrative law.

A. Kisor v Wilkie

Factually, Kisor arose from a veteran’s repeated efforts to get disability benefits from the Department of Veteran Affairs. Jurisprudentially, the background to Kisor lay in a 2011 concurrence by Justice Scalia, where he criticized the practice of giving deference to agency interpretations of their own regulations.

Known as either Seminole Rock deference (after a 1945 decision setting out the doctrine) or more recently as Auer deference (after a 1997 decision reaffirming the doctrine), this doctrine provides that courts should defer to an agency's interpretation of its own regulation unless the interpretation is “plainly erroneous or inconsistent with the regulation” or there is some other “reason to suspect that the interpretation does not reflect the agency's fair and considered judgment on the matter in question.”

Despite having authored Auer for a unanimous Court fourteen years earlier, Justice Scalia argued in 2011 that “it seems contrary to fundamental principles of separation of powers to permit the person who promulgates a law to interpret it as well” and expressed concern “that deferring to an agency's interpretation of... its own rule encourages the agency to enact vague rules which give it the power, in future adjudications, to do what it pleases.\textsuperscript{30} A majority of the Court cited Justice Scalia’s concerns the next year in \textit{Christopher v SmithKline Beecham Corporation}, when it refused to grant \textit{Auer} deference to the Department of Labor’s new interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act regulations, an interpretation DOL had offered in amicus briefs without prior notice to regulated parties.\textsuperscript{31}

Justice Scalia reiterated and expanded his criticism of the doctrine in 2013 in \textit{Decker v Northwest Environmental Defense Center}, where he picked up two additional votes (Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito) for his call to reconsider \textit{Auer} deference.\textsuperscript{32} And in 2015, in \textit{Perez v Mortgage Bankers Association}, Justice Scalia further argued that \textit{Auer} deference also violated the Administrative Procedure Act (APA).\textsuperscript{33} Justice Thomas, now fully on board, wrote an even longer opinion arguing that \textit{Auer} was unconstitutional because it “represents a transfer of judicial power to the Executive Branch, and ... amounts to an erosion of the judicial obligation to serve as a ‘check’ on the political branches.”\textsuperscript{34} Justice Alito also signaled his sympathy with these views, describing them as “offer[ing] substantial reasons why the \textit{Seminole Rock} doctrine may be incorrect.”\textsuperscript{35} But the focus of \textit{Perez} was on invalidating, as “contrary to the clear text of the [APA],” the D.C. Circuit’s requirement that agencies undertake notice and comment rulemaking before significantly changing a definitive interpretation of a rule.\textsuperscript{36} The \textit{Perez} majority was content to relegate the \textit{Auer} issue to a footnote, responding simply that “[e]ven in cases where an agency's interpretation receives \textit{Auer} deference, ... it is the court that ultimately decides whether a given regulation means what the agency says. Moreover, \textit{Auer} deference is not an inexorable command in all cases.”\textsuperscript{37}

\textit{Perez} sparked concerted efforts by business groups and conservative organizations to get a case seeking to overrule \textit{Auer} before the Court.\textsuperscript{38} One such case, involving the Department of Education’s interpretation of its rules to require public schools to allow transsexual students to use the gender bathroom of their choice, was granted but ultimately dismissed when the Trump Administration rescinded the interpretation.\textsuperscript{39} Finally, however, with \textit{Kisor} they scored the legal vehicle of their dreams. \textit{Kisor} involved about as sympathetic a plaintiff one could find: a former Marine, still suffering from his service in Vietnam, wrongly denied disability benefits when he first applied in 1982 and then subsequently unable to recoup benefits retroactively because the agency deemed the new service records he supplied not “relevant” for purposes of a VA regulation

\textsuperscript{30} \textit{Talk America}, 564 US at 68 (Scalia, J, concurring).
\textsuperscript{31} 567 US 142, 159–61 (2012).
\textsuperscript{32} 568 US 597, 615 (2013) (Scalia, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).
\textsuperscript{33} 135 S Ct 1199, 1211–12 (2015) (Scalia, J, concurring in the judgment).
\textsuperscript{34} Id at 1217 (Thomas, J, concurring in the judgment).
\textsuperscript{35} Id at 1210 (Alito, J, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).
\textsuperscript{36} Id at 1206.
\textsuperscript{37} \textit{Perez}, 135 S Ct at 1208 n 4.
\textsuperscript{39} \textit{Gloucester County School Board v GG}, 137 S Ct 1239 (2017) (mem).
governing when the agency could reconsider an earlier benefits denial.\textsuperscript{40} Moreover, the Court granted certiorari solely on the question of whether \textit{Auer} deference should be overruled.\textsuperscript{41} The general consensus from both \textit{Auer}’s critics and its defenders was that the Court was poised to overrule the doctrine.\textsuperscript{42}

But that didn’t happen. Instead, the Court, by a 5-4 vote, declined to overrule \textit{Auer}. Justice Kagan’s majority opinion defending \textit{Auer} deference was joined in full by the three other liberal justices, but Chief Justice Roberts—who provided the crucial fifth vote—joined only in part. Meanwhile Justice Gorsuch, concurring only in the judgment and joined by the three other conservative justices, assumed the role of \textit{Auer}’s prime attacker, complaining that “[i]t should have been easy for the Court to say goodbye to \textit{Auer}.”\textsuperscript{43} Justice Kavanaugh, joined by Justice Alito, also wrote separately.

\textit{1. Justice Kagan and the Limits on Auer Deference.} At first glance, Justice Kagan’s opinion has a slightly schizophrenic air. She led with \textit{Auer}’s virtues, emphasizing several reasons why it makes sense to presume that that Congress, having delegated power to an agency to implement a statute through rulemaking, would also intend to delegate power to resolve ambiguities in those rules. “In part, that is because the agency that promulgated a rule is in the ‘better position to reconstruct’ its original meaning”\textsuperscript{44}; in part, it is because agencies are more expert and politically accountable than courts; and in part, it is because deferring to agency interpretations yields greater uniformity and consistency in interpretations than having courts exercising independent judgment.\textsuperscript{45} But her most central point—what Kagan termed “the core theory of \textit{Auer} deference”\textsuperscript{46}—was that “sometimes the law runs out and policy-laden choice is what is left over.”\textsuperscript{47} And “Congress ... is attuned to the comparative advantages of agencies over courts in making such policy judgments.”\textsuperscript{48} Moreover, she emphasized that ambiguity in regulations is inevitable; although at times the result of “careless drafting,” ambiguity often instead “reflects the well-known limits of expression or knowledge.”\textsuperscript{49}

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{40} 38 CFR § 3.156(c)(1).
  \item \textsuperscript{41} \textit{Kisor}, 139 S Ct at 2408–09.
  \item \textsuperscript{42} See, for example, Gillian Metzger, \textit{The Puzzling and Troubling Grant in Kisor} (SCOTUSblog, Jan 30, 2019), archived at https://www.scotusblog.com/2019/01/symposium-the-puzzling-and-troubling-grant-in-kisor/ (describing the grant in \textit{Kisor} as part of a conservative effort to overrule \textit{Auer} and “troubling for what the case may portend about how the Roberts Court, with its newly cemented conservative majority, views the administrative state”); Kimberly Hermann, \textit{The Supreme Court and the Forgotten “Three Ring Government,”} (SCOTUSblog, Jan 29, 2019), archived at https://www.scotusblog.com/2019/01/symposium-the-supreme-court-and-the-forgotten-three-ring-government/ (stating that “[t]he Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide whether it should overrule \textit{Auer} and \textit{Seminole Rock}” and that “[a] number of Supreme Court opinions . . . suggest that the court will answer that question with a ‘yes’”).
  \item \textsuperscript{43} \textit{Kisor}, 139 S Ct at 2425 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
  \item \textsuperscript{44} Id at 2412 (plurality) (quoting \textit{Martin v Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission}, 499 US 144, 152 (1991) (internal additions omitted)).
  \item \textsuperscript{45} Id at 2410–14 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
  \item \textsuperscript{46} Id at 2415 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
  \item \textsuperscript{47} \textit{Kisor}, 239 S Ct at 2415 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
  \item \textsuperscript{48} Id at 2413 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
  \item \textsuperscript{49} Id at 2410 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
\end{itemize}
Justice Kagan then ended her opinion by rebutting at length the many attacks made against Auer deference. One such attack, raised by Kisor and by Justice Gorsuch in dissent, was that judicial deference to agency regulatory interpretations violates § 706 of the APA, which provides that “the reviewing court shall decide all relevant questions of law ... and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of an agency action.”50 Kagan argued that courts comply with §706 even when they grant Auer deference, both because they apply extensive independent review before deciding to defer and because courts are determining the meaning of a rule by deferring when they conclude that Congress delegated authority to interpret the rule to the agency which promulgated it.51 She further defended Auer’s constitutionality by insisting that courts still “retain a firm grip on the interpretive function,” agencies exercise executive power rather than judicial power when they interpret, and the combination of legislative, judicial and executive functions in agencies had long been upheld.52 She also dismissed the claim that Auer deference create poor agency incentives “to issue vague and open-ended regulations,” maintaining that it “does not survive an encounter with reality.”53 Finally, Kagan argued strongly for retaining Auer deference on stare decisis grounds.54

In between these powerful defenses of Auer deference, however, Justice Kagan elaborated a multitude of limits that significantly constrain when Auer deference applies. First, Auer deference is only triggered in cases of “genuine[ly] ambigu[ity],” which means not just surface ambiguity but the type of ambiguity that remains after a court has rigorously applied the traditional tools of statutory interpretation. In addition, the agency must offer a reasonable interpretation, the interpretation must be one that represents the agency’s “authoritative” view, “implies its substantive expertise,” reflects the agency’s “fair and considered judgment” and does not “create unfair surprise to regulated parties.”55 This long list closely parallels the “significant limits” on Auer deference that the Solicitor General advocated in his Kisor brief.56 And it led Justice Gorsuch in concurring in the judgment to chastise the majority for retaining Auer deference only in a “maimed,” “enfeebled,” and “zombified” form.57 That may go too far, but Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Kavanaugh (the latter joined by Justice Alito) have a point in claiming that the distance between Justice Kagan’s opinion retaining Auer and Justice Gorsuch’s dispensing with it “is not as great as it may initially appear.”58 Certainly that was true in the case at hand, for Kagan ultimately concluded that lower court “jumped the gun in declaring the [VA’s] regulation ambiguous” and suggested that the non-precedential agency interpretation at issue—one of 80,000 issued by 100 judges sitting singly each year—might well not be the type of considered, authoritative interpretation needed for Auer deference to apply.

50 5 USC § 706.
51 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2419–20 (Kagan, J) (plurality). She further insisted that deference does not give an interpretive rule the binding effect that the APA limits to legislative rules for which § 553 demands notice and comment procedures, emphasizing against the independent review that courts undertake before deciding to defer and the restriction of Auer deference to “an agency’s authoritative and considered judgments” served § 553 values. Id at 2420–21 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
52 Id at 2421–22 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
53 Id at 2421 (Kagan, J) (plurality) (noting not only the lack of empirical evidence to support this claim, but also that agencies have all sorts of practical incentives to be clear).
54 Id at 2422 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
55 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2414–18 (internal quotations and citations omitted).
57 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2425 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
58 Id at 2424 (Roberts, CJ, concurring in part); see also id at 2448 (Kavanaugh, J, concurring in the judgment).
A reader is left wondering whether Auer deference is really as beneficial as Justice Kagan makes it out to be—and if it is, why on earth the majority doesn’t let it have broader sway. One obvious explanation for this tension in Justice Kagan’s opinion is Chief Justice Roberts. He concurred only in the parts of Kagan’s opinion setting out Auer’s limits, arguing that Auer deference should be retained on stare decisis grounds, and reversing for reconsideration of whether Auer deference should be applied here. Put differently, only four justices were willing to state that Auer deference yields benefits or conforms to Congress’s expectations and the APA. Why Roberts was unwilling to join more of Kagan’s opinion is difficult to explain, given that he had previously argued that the courts’ law declaring role under the Constitution and the APA can be compatible with deference to agency legal interpretations. But in light of his stance, the limits Kisor imposed on Auer deference appear the necessary price to have Auer retained by a majority at all.

Although the need to secure Roberts’s vote no doubt played an important role in shaping the majority opinion, it would be a mistake to view Kagan’s cabining of Auer as simply strategic. To begin with, Kagan herself offered a different account, arguing that the limits are prerequisites for securing the benefits of Auer deference, not impediments to that goal. As she put it, the presumption that Congress would want a court to defer to an agency’s interpretation would not be justified absent ambiguity or “when a court concludes that an interpretation does not reflect an agency’s authoritative, expertise-based, fair or considered judgment.” In addition, Kagan contended that these limits were ones that the Court had already recognized in its prior Auer jurisprudence. Moreover, as a legal academic Justice Kagan had argued strongly in favor of limiting deference to interpretations meaningfully reviewed and personally offered by the agency official to whom Congress had delegated authority over the relevant administrative action. Kagan wrote there about Chevron deference, but there is an obvious linkage to her argument here that Auer deference should be limited to “authoritative” and “considered” agency regulatory interpretations. Indeed, in many ways Kisor represents the importation of Chevron/Mead analysis into the Auer context: The Kisor limits add a Mead Step Zero, identifying certain contexts in which Auer deference is not even potentially available, and also a rigorous Chevron Step One inquiry, in which a court must determine if sufficient ambiguity exists to trigger Auer deference.

These defenses of Kisor’s limits are only partially successful. It is true that the Court already had “cabin[ing] Auer’s scope in varied and critical ways,” but the Court certainly expanded on these limits in Kisor. More importantly, Kagan pandered over the evident tensions between the limits she articulated and the justifications she offered for Auer deference. Take, for example, 59 See City of Arlington, 569 US at 316–17 (Roberts, CJ, dissenting) (arguing that deference is compatible with the court’s law declaring role provided Congress had delegated interpretive authority to agencies).

---

60 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2414 (Kagan, J) (plurality) (internal additions and citations omitted).

Kagan’s argument that agencies are more expert and politically accountable than courts, and thus Congress would likely consider agencies better positioned to make the policy judgments that resolving regulatory ambiguity requires.\(^{64}\) Surely this institutional competency argument for deference also extends to instances in which agencies change their interpretations, even at the cost of unfair surprise, provided agencies provide a reasoned explanation for the change. Yet Kagan rejected deference in such circumstances. And while a good case can be made that Congress would not intend deference when the text of a rule is clear, it is hardly obvious that Congress would want courts to work hard to resolve seeming ambiguities on their own, rather than to defer to agencies once some ambiguity becomes apparent. After all, agencies’ greater expertise and knowledge of the rule likely makes them better positioned to determine when ambiguity actually exists, as well as to resolve that ambiguity once identified. Kagan also downplays the costs that \textit{Auer}’s limits may carry, in particular the way that a more case-by-case assessment of relevant factors increases uncertainty for regulated parties and agencies alike. Gorsuch underscored this point,\(^{65}\) and it is one that Kagan had previously acknowledged,\(^{66}\) yet she largely ignored it here.

This is not to say that the limits Justice Kagan imposed on \textit{Auer} deference are indefensible, but rather that their underlying rationale does not and cannot lie solely in congressional intent. Instead, these limits stem from normative and functional concerns—in particular, fairness to regulated parties, the need for a check on agency power, ensuring expert decisionmaking, and encouraging political accountability. In her past life as an academic, Kagan was open about how deference doctrines “arise from and reflect candid policy judgments ... about the allocation of interpretive authority.”\(^{67}\) But in \textit{Kisor} she avoided forthright engagement with the conflicting concerns at work in constructing deference doctrines. Take again the example of changed agency interpretations: Such interpretations often reflect transformations in administrative policy stemming from change in political control of the executive branch, yet they risk undercutting legitimate reliance. In \textit{Kisor}, Justice Kagan plainly prioritized reliance over electoral accountability, but we are left to wonder why.\(^{68}\)

2. Justice Gorsuch’s Contrasting Vision. Justice Gorsuch provided a very different take on \textit{Auer} deference, recounting in detail what had become the standard litany of \textit{Auer}’s sins. He maintained that \textit{Auer} deference was a historical aberration plainly at odds with the APA’s judicial review and procedural requirements. In his view, §706’s “unqualified command requires the court to determine legal questions—including questions about a regulation’s meaning—by its own lights.” Hence, a “court that, in deference to an agency, adopts something other than the best reading of a regulation ... is abdicating the duty Congress assigned to it.”\(^{69}\) And \textit{Auer} “effectively nullifies the distinction” Congress drew between notice-and-comment rules that carry the force of

\(^{64}\) \textit{Kisor}, 139 S Ct at 2413 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
\(^{65}\) Id at 2445 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
\(^{68}\) One possible reason is that agencies can still achieve policy change; they simply must change the underlying legislative rule through notice and comment rulemaking to do so. Justice Gorsuch offered this argument. See \textit{Kisor}, 139 S Ct at 2442 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment). But Kagan rejected such a procedural requirement on the ground (also articulated in \textit{Perez}) that the APA does not impose notice and comment rulemaking requirements on interpretive rules. Id at 2420 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
\(^{69}\) Id at 2432 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
law and interpretive rules that do not. In the face of such “clear statutory commands,” he argued it made no sense to presume that Congress “really, secretly, wanted courts to treat agency interpretations as binding.” He argued equally forcefully that Auer violates Article III and the separation of powers “by coopt[ing] the judicial power,” and uniting “the powers of making, enforcing and interpreting the laws ... in the same hands,” thereby compromising “a cornerstone of the rule of law.” Underlying these statutory and constitutional arguments was Gorsuch’s rejection of Kagan’s equation of law and policy. Such an equation “contradicts a basic premise of our legal order: that we are governed not by the shifting whims of politicians and bureaucrats, but by written laws whose meaning is fixed and ascertainable.” Left out of this portrayal is the possibility that the alternative to agency deference might actually be governance by the shifting whims of life-tenured federal judges, as they struggle to give meaning to complicated and indeterminate laws.

A particularly notable contrast lies in the two opinions’ views of agencies. For Justice Kagan, agencies are expert bodies assigned public responsibilities by Congress and inevitably confronted with regulatory ambiguity. For Justice Gorsuch, they are biased actors who are no different than self-interested private parties and will exploit ambiguity to their own advantage. For Kagan, agencies’ political aspect is a positive feature, helping to ensure that the administrative state remains accountable; for Gorsuch, it means that Auer deference threatens the constitutional structure by elevating “raw political executive power” over the Constitution’s promise of an independent and impartial judiciary. These divergent views suggest very different understandings of the administrative state. Implicit in Kagan’s opinion is a positive account of administrative government and the benefits of expert and accountable regulation; the image she repeatedly referred to was of the FDA and its expertise when it comes to identifying active moieties. Justice Gorsuch explicitly articulates a darker vision, one under which the “explosive growth of the administrative state [and regulations] over the last half-century” means that the “mischief” and “cost” of Auer deference has “increased dramatically.”

In addition, where Justice Kagan’s defense of Auer is qualified and cabined, Justice Gorsuch’s attack on the doctrine is uncompromising and absolute. Yet at times Gorsuch’s arguments seem overdone. From his opinion it is hard to understand how the Court could ever have been so benighted to adopt Auer deference in the first place, let alone adhere to it for decades and preserve it for the future. Or take Gorsuch’s attack on “the majority’s attempt to remodel

70 Id at 2434 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
71 Id at 2435 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
72 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2439–40 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment) (emphasis omitted).
73 Id.
74 Id at 2410, 2413, 2421 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
75 Compare id at 2425–26, see also id 2442–43 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment) (noting agency expertise as a basis for taking agency views seriously, but not for deference because agencies may be wrong).
76 Compare Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2413 (Kagan, J) (plurality), with id at 2439–40 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment)
77 Id at 2410, 2413 (plurality). Under an FDA regulation, pharmaceutical companies receive exclusive rights to drug products if they contain “no active moiety that has been approved by FDA in any other” new drug application. 21 C.F.R. § 314.108(a) (2010). Kagan emphasized the difficult questions that interpreting this regulation entails, such as whether “a company has] created a new ‘active moiety’ by joining a previously approved moiety to lysine through a non-ester covalent bond.” Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2410 (Kagan, J) (plurality). Speaking with conviction, she added that “[i]f you are a judge, you probably have no idea of what the FDA’s rule means.” Id at 2413 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
78 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2446–47 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
Auer’s rule into a multi-step, multifactor inquiry [that] guarantees more uncertainty and much litigation.”79 Although the uncertainty generated by Kisor is a valid point, Gorsuch insisted in the same breath that the better approach would be to apply the notoriously fuzzy doctrine of Skidmore deference—under which the weight given an agency’s interpretation of a regulation would depend on the factors that give it “power to persuade.”80 On a clarity and certainty scale, Kisor’s domesticated version of Auer and Skidmore deference are hardly worlds apart.

Ultimately, Gorsuch insisted that Kisor’s affirmance of Auer is “more a stay of execution than a pardon,” all but inviting future challenges until the Court “find[s] the nerve ... [to] inter Auer at last.”81 By thus vowing continued resistance, Gorsuch may have done more to guarantee ongoing uncertainty and dispute than the majority’s new limits did. And with the disruptive stakes of efforts to overturn Auer thus clarified, it is not surprising that stare decisis became the decisive issue in the case.

3. Stare Decisis, Auer Deference, and Chevron. Kisor was one of many cases in the 2018 Term in which stare decisis emerged as a central point of contention among the justices.82 What made Kisor unusual is that stare decisis concerns carried the day here—and even more, did so over the contention that stare decisis was categorically inapplicable to deference doctrines.

Both Justice Kagan and Justice Gorsuch offered standard stare decisis claims. Kagan’s main stare decisis argument was the disruption that overruling Auer deference would cause, given that the doctrine represents a “long line of precedents ... going back 75 years or more” and “pervades the whole corpus of administrative law. ... It is the rare overruling that introduces so much instability into so many areas of law, all in one blow.”83 Kagan’s argument on this score was helped by the fact that both Kisor’s attorney and the Solicitor General had acknowledged that overturning Auer would open up many precedents to reconsideration.84 She also emphasized that Congress was free to overrule Auer but had not done so, suggesting that Auer deference should enjoy the same high level of stare decisis accorded statutory constructions.85 Gorsuch, for his part, drew on a litany of established grounds for rejecting stare decisis, insisting that Auer deference was accidental, never justified, unworkable, at odds with norms of legal interpretation, and not a doctrine on which private parties had relied.86

But their main bone of contention centered on how Auer deference should be viewed. Justice Kagan framed Auer deference as a substantive doctrine and inseparable (at least

79 Id at 2447 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
81 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2425–26 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
82 Stare decisis to Supreme Court precedent was discussed in five cases in the 2018 Term, including Kisor. See Knick v Township of Scott, 139 S Ct 2162 (2019); Franchise Tax Board v Hyatt, 139 S Ct 148 (2019); Gamble v United States, 139 S Ct 1960 (2019); Stokeling v United States, 139 S Ct 544 (2019).
83 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2422.
84 Id.
85 Id.
86 Id at 2445–47 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
categorically) from the results reached in specific cases where it is applied.\(^{87}\) Justice Gorsuch did not seriously dispute the disruptive impact of overruling\(^{\text{Auer}}\) if viewed in substantive terms. But he rejected this framing, arguing that the better analogy is to see\(^{\text{Auer}}\) as an interpretive methodology, like the “proper weight to afford to historical practice in constitutional cases or legislative history in statutory cases,” which the Court does not regard as “binding future Justices with the full force of horizontal \textit{stare decisis}.”\(^{88}\) Gorsuch based this claim on the fact that\(^{\text{Auer}}\) does not “purport to settle the meaning of a single statute or resolve a particular case” but instead claims “to prescribe an interpretive methodology governing every future dispute.”\(^{89}\)

Neither Justice Kagan’s nor Justice Gorsuch’s arguments on this front are fully satisfying. As Randy Kozel has maintained, deference doctrines fall somewhere in-between decisions addressing specific substantive interpretations and interpretive methodologies.\(^{90}\) It is analytically possible, if smacking of \textit{ipse dixit}, to overrule\(^{\text{Auer}}\) while still according \textit{stare decisis} effect to specific decisions reached in reliance on\(^{\text{Auer}}\). In addition, Gorsuch has a point in arguing that\(^{\text{Auer}}\)’s breadth of application means that applying \textit{stare decisis} here has a greater constraining effect on judges than granting \textit{stare decisis} to specific interpretations.\(^{91}\) On the other hand, Gorsuch’s further suggestion that congressional efforts to tell courts how to review agency interpretations may unconstitutionally intrude on judicial independence is a more radical proposition than he acknowledged and unsupported by current case law.\(^{92}\) It would call much of §706 of the APA into question, for example, as that provision consists entirely of congressional instructions to courts on how to review agency action.\(^{93}\)

On the whole, Kagan’s identification of\(^{\text{Auer}}\) as a substantive doctrine is more persuasive than Gorsuch’s effort to analogize it to a method of interpretation. To begin with, Gorsuch’s effort to equate\(^{\text{Auer}}\) with an interpretive methodology is hard to square with the Court’s practice of treating deference doctrines as mandatory. Prior to the current attack on\(^{\text{Auer}}\) and\(^{\text{Chevron}}\), the Court did not debate whether or not those frameworks governed its review of agency regulatory and statutory interpretations; instead, the justices’ disagreements centered on questions internal to \(^{87}\) \textit{Kisor}, 139 S Ct at 2410–14 (Kagan, J) (plurality).

\(^{88}\) Id at 2444 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment). Whether interpretive methodologies are as optional as Gorsuch claims is debatable; Gorsuch himself suggests that one reason to get rid of\(^{\text{Auer}}\) is that the doctrine is at odds with currently governing norms of interpretation that give little weight to congressional intent. Id at 2442 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment). Whether they should be optional is debatable as well. Compare Abbe Gluck, \textit{The States as Laboratories of Statutory Interpretation: Methodological Consensus and the New Modified Textualism}, 119 Yale L J 1750 (2010), with Evan J. Criddle and Glen Staszewski, \textit{Against Methodological Stare Decisis}, 102 Georgetown L J 1573 (2014).

\(^{89}\) \textit{Kisor}, 139 S Ct at 2444 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).

\(^{91}\) \textit{Kisor}, 139 S Ct at 2444 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment) (claiming that stare decisis in the\(^{\text{Auer}}\) context would dictate “the interpretive inferences that future Justices must draw in construing statutes and regulations that the Court has never engaged”).

\(^{92}\) Id at 2439–40 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).

\(^{93}\) See 5 USC § 706; Merrill, 54 Admin L Rev at 823 (cited in note 62) (explaining that the Court’s precedents in \textit{Christensen v Harris County}, 529 US 576 (2000), and \textit{United States v Mead}, 533 US 218 (2001) “make it clear that Congress has the authority to turn\(^{\text{Chevron}}\) deference on and off”). For an argument that Congress lacks power to enact mandatory rules of statutory interpretation, see Larry Alexander and Saikrishna Prakash, \textit{Mother May I? Imposing Mandatory Prospective Rules of Statutory Interpretation}, 20 Const Comment 97, 99–100 (2003).
those frameworks, such as whether the relevant regulatory or statutory texts were ambiguous.\textsuperscript{94} And while vertical stare decisis raises issues about the Supreme Court’s superintendence of lower federal courts that are absent from horizontal stare decisis, it merits note that the Court does not portray deference doctrines as optional for lower courts to follow. To the contrary, the Court has reversed lower courts for mistakes in their application these frameworks.\textsuperscript{95} Of course, that an approach represents the Court’s current practice does not immunize it from criticism and change, but current practice should carry particular weight in stare decisis assessments.

In addition, Gorsuch’s suggestion that transsubstantive doctrines should not trigger stare decisis would have a dramatic impact on administrative law. Administrative law is transsubstantive to its core. Although many of its transsubstantive doctrines are ultimately rooted in the APA or another statute, they frequently represent substantial judicial development from that statutory basis.\textsuperscript{96} As a result, rejecting stare decisis for transsubstantive doctrines could open up the field to fundamental transformation. That links Gorsuch’s rejection of stare decisis to the rest of his opinion and its broad invocation of constitutional first principles to oppose Auer deference. It also supports Kagan’s insistence that rejection of Auer deference would be profoundly disruptive; the arguments for overturning Auer are not easily cabined to the context of agency regulatory interpretations but would extend to other deference contexts and other instances in which agencies combine legislative, executive, and adjudicatory functions.

The potential implications of Kisor for other administrative law doctrines was driven home by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Kavanaugh, both of whom insisted in their concurrences that the decision in Kisor did not resolve the propriety of Chevron deference to agency statutory interpretations.\textsuperscript{97} These statements are puzzling. Stare decisis should be at least as much of a concern for Chevron deference, if not more so, given Chevron’s greater centrality to administrative law.\textsuperscript{98} Moreover, it is hard to see why the formalist argument that granting agencies interpretive power unconstitutionally intrudes on the judicial power would be any different between Auer and Chevron. Indeed, Justice Thomas and then-Judge Gorsuch have penned opinions castigating Chevron deference in exactly the same terms.\textsuperscript{99} Given that this argument failed to obtain majority support in Kisor, logically it should also fail to get majority support in a case addressing Chevron. Further reinforcing the parallels between the two deference doctrines, the Court already has curtailed Chevron deference in ways similar to the limits imposed on Auer deference in Kisor, such as requiring more evidence that an interpretation is authorized and more judicial probing before concluding ambiguity exists.\textsuperscript{100}

\textsuperscript{94} See, for example, MCI Telecommunications Corp v American Telephone & Telegraph Co, 512 US 218 (1994), where the majority and dissent disagreed over whether the phrase “modify any requirement” was sufficiently ambiguous to warrant Chevron deference.

\textsuperscript{95} Decker, 568 US 597 (2013) (reversing the Ninth Circuit for failing to apply Auer deference to an agency interpretation of a rule); Entergy Corp v Riverkeeper Inc, 556 US 208 (2009) (reversing the Second Circuit for failing to grant Chevron deference to the EPA’s choice to use cost-benefit analysis).

\textsuperscript{97} Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2425 (Roberts, CJ, concurring in part); id at 2449 (Kavanaugh, J, concurring in the judgment).

\textsuperscript{98} Indeed, in Perez, 135 S Ct at 1212–13 (Scalia, J, concurring in the judgment). Justice Scalia argued that stare decisis counted more strongly for retaining Chevron deference than Auer deference.

\textsuperscript{100} See, for example, Mead, 533 US at 226–27 (emphasizing limits on Chevron’s applicability, in particular that “Congress [have] delegated authority to the agency generally to make rules carrying the force of law, and that the
Perhaps Roberts and Kavanaugh simply did not want to be read as answering the question of Chevron’s status in a case addressing Auer, but were not signaling they would reach a different result. Alternatively, they may have wanted to preserve room to pullback further on Chevron’s across-the-board presumption of implied congressional delegation of authority to agencies to fill gaps and resolve ambiguities in the statutes they administer. This would fit their prior jurisprudence; in particular, Roberts has argued that questions addressing jurisdiction or matters of “deep economic and political significance” should not receive Chevron deference, and Kavanaugh has rejected Chevron deference for agency authority to issue major rules.\(^{101}\) If so, they might continue to support Chevron deference to agency interpretations when expressly authorized by Congress or when they view statutory terms as plainly granting deference. Another possible reason for their statements is that, unlike Auer, Chevron deference grants an agency interpretive authority over Congress’s handiwork and not the agency’s own regulations. Although Justice Scalia viewed this feature as making Auer deference more suspect because it allowed agencies to self-delegate power,\(^ {102}\) one could argue that the opposite is true. On this view, Chevron is the greater threat to the constitutional order because it elevates agencies over Congress and in the process removes statutes as critical external checks on agencies’ claims to power. If adopted, this argument would most strongly call Chevron deference into question, but for that reason it is hardest to square with both justices’ willingness to grant Chevron deference in the past.

B. Department of Commerce v New York

Judicial deference to agency decisionmaking was also at the heart of Department of Commerce. But that was where the parallels between these two cases ended. Department of Commerce lacked a Supreme Court jurisprudential lead up akin to that in Kisor. Similarly lacking were calls for a fundamental reconsideration of existing doctrine; to the contrary, the different opinions in Department of Commerce sought to outdo each other with their adherence to governing frameworks. Most striking, however, was the changed position of the different justices, with the justices who urged overturning Auer here arguing for substantial deference to agency policy choices, and those who defended Auer here advocating subjecting agency decisionmaking to greater scrutiny.

At issue in Department of Commerce was Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross’s decision in March 2018 to add a question about citizenship to the 2020 census. Doing so went against the strong advice of the Census Bureau in the Department of Commerce. Ever since 1950, the Bureau has argued against adding a citizenship question to the census form that went to most households, agency interpretation claiming deference was promulgated in the exercise of that authority”\(^{101}\)) and Wisconsin Central Ltd v United States, 138 S Ct 2067, 2074 (2018) (concluding that the statutory text in question was “clear enough . . . , leaving no ambiguity for the agency to fill”). Indeed, Justice Kagan noted this similarity. See Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2414 (Kagan, J) (plurality) (citing Mead, 533 US at 229–31).

\(^{101}\) See King v Burwell, 135 S Ct 2480, 2489 (2015) (refusing to apply Chevron deference to a question of deep economic and political significance absent express indication from Congress it wanted the agency to have such interpretive authority); United States Telecom Association v FCC, 855 F3d 381, 417–18 (DC Cir 2017) (Kavanaugh, J, dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) (arguing that there must be clear congressional authorization for major agency rules).

\(^{102}\) See Decker, 568 US at 619–21 (Scalia, J, concurring and dissenting in part).
out of concern that the question would lower response rates and generate false claims of citizenship that would undercut the census’s accuracy. Moreover, Bureau officials maintain that better citizenship data was available from other administrative records, including the American Community Survey, which the Bureau sends every year to a small percentage of U.S. households on a rotating basis. 103 Ross ultimately opted for an approach that would include a citizenship question on the census as well as draw on administrative records. In explaining his decision to add the question—and in testifying to Congress—Ross repeatedly emphasized that the Department of Justice (DOJ) needed census-block citizenship data to enforce the Voting Rights Act and had submitted a letter asking for the question’s inclusion.104

Litigation immediately followed, with two of the lawsuits being consolidated in federal district court in New York City. The case was unusual from the start. It quickly became evident that the initial administrative record submitted to the court was, to put it kindly, sparse. On its own initiative, the Government supplemented the record with a brief memo from Ross indicating not only that Ross had sought to include a citizenship question well before DOJ’s request, but also that DOJ had only made the request at Commerce’s prodding. These revelations caused the district court to order the Government to complete the administrative record, which led to over 12,000 pages of new material being added.105 In addition, the district court granted the plaintiffs’ motion for extra-record discovery and depositions, including of Secretary Ross, after concluding that the new record material strongly suggested that the plaintiffs would find evidence showing that Ross acted in bad faith.106 These discovery disputes were the basis for the case’s first appearance at the Supreme Court in October 2018, where the Court stayed Ross’s deposition but let the rest of the extra-record development go forward, over a dissent by Justices Gorsuch and Thomas.107 The district court proceeded to issue a mammoth 178-page opinion just three months later, enjoining addition of the citizenship question on the grounds that Secretary Ross’s decision violated the Census Act and was arbitrary and capricious, and further that the Secretary’s explanation for why he had added the question was pretextual.108 The Supreme Court immediately jumped back in, taking the uncommon step of granting the Government’s request for certiorari before the court of appeals heard the case and making the case a late addition to the 2018 Term.109

Much of this speed and early Supreme Court involvement can be put down to fast approaching deadlines for printing the census, but also reflected the case’s high-profile status and clear political ramifications. The states and localities challenging the decision to add a citizenship

105 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2564; Appendix to Petition for a Writ of Certiorari, Department of Commerce v New York, No 18-966, *546a (US filed Jan 25, 2019).
107 In re Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct 16 (Oct 22, 2018).
109 For a discussion of the Solicitor General’s recent efforts to get cases to the Supreme Court extremely quickly, including in Department of Commerce, see Stephen I. Vladeck, The Solicitor General and the Shadow Docket, 133 Harv L Rev 123 (2019).
question were blue jurisdictions with substantial noncitizen populations that stood to lose representation and funds from undercounting minorities. Those supporting the administration were red jurisdictions that would gain from an undercount elsewhere.\textsuperscript{110} In addition, adding the citizenship question echoed strongly with the Trump Administration’s harsh stance on unlawful immigration and with Republican efforts to draw electoral districts based on citizenship voting age population—a move that a leading Republican redistricting strategist described as “advantageous to Republicans and Non-Hispanic Whites” and argued “would clearly be a disadvantage for the Democrats.”\textsuperscript{111} Fittingly, the drama surrounding the case reached an even greater pitch once it was revealed after oral argument that this same strategist had urged Ross to add the question and ghostwritten the DOJ letter. That the strategist’s involvement emerged only because his estranged daughter happened to find the documents in his files after his death was just icing on the cake.\textsuperscript{112}

1. Chief Justice Roberts’s Split Opinion. Chief Justice Roberts was again the pivotal vote in the case but here wrote the majority opinion. Like Kagan’s opinion in \textit{Kisor}, Roberts’s majority opinion has a split personality. Roberts was joined by four justices—Thomas, Alito, Gorsuch, and Kavanaugh—in concluding that Secretary Ross’s decision to add the question was not arbitrary and capricious and did not violate the Census Act. And he was also joined by four justices, but a different four—Ginsburg, Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan—in concluding that the decision nonetheless had to be remanded because the explanation Ross provided was pretextual.\textsuperscript{113}

The split character of Roberts’s opinion shows even more in his tone and reasoning. Most of the opinion treated Ross’s decision as a perfectly reasonable and historically-grounded policy choice. Roberts began with a brief description of the role and history of the census, emphasizing that “[e]very census between 1820 and 2000 (with the exception of 1840) asked at least some of the population about their citizenship or place of birth.”\textsuperscript{114} Roberts proceeded to give Secretary Ross every possible benefit of the doubt and then some. For example, where the district court and Justice Breyer’s partial dissent criticized Ross for failing to take into account the Census Bureau’s assessment that adding a citizenship question would harm the accuracy of the census, Roberts underscored uncertainties in the Bureau’s analysis. Roberts even went so far as to suggest that it was “inconclusive” whether adding the question would depress census response rates at all, despite the Census Bureau’s own conclusions to the contrary. This framing allowed Roberts to portray

\textsuperscript{113} \textit{Department of Commerce}, 139 S Ct at 2555.

\textsuperscript{114} Id at 2561.
Ross’s decision as a paradigmatic example of the type of “value-laden decisionmaking and the weighing of incommensurables under conditions of uncertainty” to which courts owe deference. Not only was “the choice between reasonable policy alternatives in the face of uncertainty ... the Secretary’s to make,” but also Ross’s choice was “reasonable and reasonably explained, particularly in light of the long history of the citizenship question on the census.”

Then in the final Part V of his opinion, Roberts dramatically changed his tune. Here Roberts took the evidentiary record at face value and rejected the government’s entreaties to exclude the extra-record material, concluding that ultimately the district court was justified in adding it. Far from being reasonable decisionmaker in the face of uncertainty, Ross was now portrayed as having a closed mind from the get-go: “Th[e] evidence showed that the Secretary was determined to reinstate a citizenship question from the time he entered office ... [and] instructed his staff to make it happen.” Worse, that evidence showed that Ross’s “VRA enforcement rationale—the sole stated reason [for adding the citizenship question]—seems to have been contrived,” was “incongruent with ... the record,” and simply “a distraction.” Or, put with less finesse, the record showed that Ross had lied. By definition, that meant he had acted unreasonably, for “[a]ccepting contrived reasons would defeat the purpose” of courts requiring agencies to provide reasoned explanations for their actions.

Roberts’s invalidation of Ross’s decision as pretextual stands in sharp contrast to his majority opinion just a year before in Trump v Hawaii. There, Roberts wrote for a 5-4 Court sustaining a ban on travel to the United States from a number of countries, almost all of which were majority-Muslim, despite substantial evidence suggesting the ban was animated by anti-Muslim bias. This evidence included the proverbial smoking gun—numerous statements by President Trump and his advisors demonstrating such bias and arguing for a Muslim ban or identifying the travel ban as a Muslim ban—as well as a process used in issuing the initial version of the ban that deviated substantially from usual practice. Yet other than recounting this history, Roberts limited his analysis to the face of the ban and the process used to produce the version of the ban that was before the Court. In Hawaii, Roberts emphasized that the travel ban implicated national security matters over which courts owed the President particular deference, and the absence of such matters in Department of Commerce may help explain his greater scrutiny here. Yet as both Justices Thomas and Alito argued, the census is also a context in which the executive branch enjoys substantial discretion, but that did not preclude Roberts from invalidating on pretext grounds.

On the other hand, the split character of Roberts’s opinion in Department of Commerce brings to mind another Roberts opinion, the one he wrote in 2012 in NFIB v Sebelius. There, too, 115 Id at 2571.

116 Id.
117 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2574.
118 Id at 2575.
119 Id.
120 Id at 2576.
121 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2576.
123 Id at 2435–40 (Sotomayor, J, dissenting).
124 Id at 2420–23.
Roberts alternated between his conservative and liberal colleagues, agreeing with the former that the individual mandate of the Affordable Care Act (ACA) fell outside the constitutional scope of Congress’s commerce or necessary and proper powers but joining with the latter to hold that the ACA nonetheless was a constitutional tax.125 And the same institutional legitimacy concerns that motivated Roberts in NFIB126 appear to have played a role here, as signaled by Roberts’s statement that the Court did not have to “exhibit a naivete from which ordinary citizens are free” in concluding that Ross’s claimed rationale of wanting to support VRA enforcement was pretextual.127 To sanction Ross’s decision in the face of such evident deception and partisanship risked the Court being viewed as simply a political institution, much the way invalidating the signal Democratic political achievement in a generation might have done.128 Reports that Roberts changed his stance on pretext after oral argument, while the drama surrounding the case was growing outside the Court, adds support to the conclusion that institutional legitimacy concerns animated his position.129

Yet this legitimacy account does not really explain the split character of Roberts’s opinion. Why risk having the Court appear political by defending the Trump Administration’s decision to add a citizenship question, only to conclude that this decision was pretextual and therefore invalid? If Roberts’s goal was to give each side something to mute criticism of the Court, he was no more successful here than in NFIB; in both cases his opinions sparked strong partial dissents and critical public response.130 An alternative explanation for Roberts’s split opinion is that he believed the pretextual problem with Ross’s decision was curable. This explanation fits with Roberts’s decision to remand and his emphasis that the Court was “not hold[ing] that the agency decision here was substantively invalid.”131 But it is harder to square with Roberts’s conclusion that the only reason Ross had offered for adding the question—enhanced VRA enforcement—was not an actual reason for his decision. That conclusion, pivotal to Roberts’s determination that Ross’s explanation was pretextual, made it very hard to see how the pretext problem could be cured without undertaking an entirely new decisionmaking process.132 But the Solicitor General had long maintained that the census form had to be finalized by the end of June to meet the deadlines for conducting the census in 2020, which would not allow leeway for anything more than a pro forma stamp on remand.133

126 Joan Biskupic, The Chief: The Life and Turbulent Times of Chief Justice John Roberts 248 (Basic Books 2019) (claiming that concerns for the institutional legitimacy of the Court help persuade Roberts to switch his vote).
127 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2575 (quoting United States v Stanchich, 550 F2d 1294, 1300 (2d Cir 1977) (Friendly, J)).
128 Biskupic, The Chief at 233 (cited in note 126) (noting that Roberts disliked the initial partisan lineup to strike down the ACA).
131 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2576.
132 Id at 2575–76; SEC v Chenery, 332 US 194, 196 (1947) (“[A] simple but fundamental rule of administrative law . . . is . . . that a reviewing court, in dealing with a determination or judgment which an administrative agency alone is authorized to make, must judge the propriety of such action solely by the grounds invoked by the agency.”).
Not only would such a pro forma approach fail to cure the pretext the Court had identified, but upholding such a pro forma process after remand would make the Court look worse than if it had just upheld the decision initially. As a result, the pretext ruling meant the end of the Trump Administration’s effort to add a citizenship question to the 2020 census, as DOJ attorneys soon concluded and ultimately so did the Attorney General and the President.

2. The Administrative Record, Pretext, and Arbitrary and Capriciousness Review. Reflecting the split nature of Roberts’s opinion, there were strong partial dissents from the other justices on each side, as well from Justice Alito who argued that judicial review was inappropriate because the content of the census was “committed to agency discretion by law.”

Put together, the Department of Commerce opinions represent an administrative law smorgasbord, addressing a range of difficult questions concerning pretext in administrative contexts, the nature of the administrative record, the scope of arbitrary and capriciousness review, and the proper balance of politics and expertise in administrative contexts. Yet, strikingly, none of the opinions acknowledged the difficulty of the issues addressed and instead treated the answers they gave as dictated by existing precedent and indisputable.

Justice Thomas, joined by Justices Gorsuch and Kavanaugh, condemned the Court’s invalidation of Ross’s decision on pretext grounds as “unprecedented” and a dangerous “departure from our deferential review of discretionary agency decisions.” He insisted that pretext was simply not a relevant inquiry under arbitrary and capriciousness review and that the record did not establish pretext in any event. Thomas also chastised the Court for “proceeding beyond the administrative record,” warning that the effect of doing so was to provide a new “avenue of attack” for opponents of executive branch actions, which would “allow partisans to use the courts to harangue executive officers through depositions, discovery, delay, and distraction.”

Thomas’s concerns about courts going outside the record resonate in existing case law. A venerable line of administrative law jurisprudence emphasizes that “the focal point of judicial review should be the administrative record already in existence, not some new record made initially in the reviewing court.” After initially allowing court supplementation in instances when more formal findings were lacking, the Court quickly moved to the view that when a reviewing court considers the agency record to be inadequate in some way, “the proper course, except in rare circumstances, is to remand to the agency for additional investigation of explanation.” Thomas’s sudden solicitude for effective governance is surprising, given the extent to which he has dismissed similar functionality concerns in his recent administrative law opinions.

Still, his point on this score is well-taken. In an era in which litigation is the prime means by which partisans on both sides seek to derail executive branch actions they oppose, allowing extra-record supplementation risks further hampering of effective government administration.

Yet the issue of the district court’s extra-record supplementation was largely a sideshow here. Neither the discovery or depositions that the district court ordered in Department of Commerce ended up mattering all that much.140 Instead, what was pivotal was the material the Government supplied to complete the administrative record per a stipulation with the plaintiffs. The district court found that this material alone demonstrated that Ross’s decision was arbitrary and capricious and pretextual.141 Although Roberts invoked the wider universe of both completed-record and extra-record material, he too emphasized that the completed-record material on its own created the “strong showing of bad faith or improper behavior” sufficient to justify extra-record supplementation under the Court’s restrictive precedents.142

Notably, neither Roberts’s majority opinion or Thomas’s partial dissent addresses the question of what should be included in the administrative record in the first place. The proper answer to this question is not clear in informal proceedings such as the decisionmaking here, where agencies are not limited to considering materials in a formal record.143 The APA states that judicial review should be undertaken based on the “whole record” without defining what counts as the record: Is it the record provided to the court, the record that the agency considered or relied upon in making its decision, or the record of all the material before the agency? Lower courts take different approaches to this question.144 Moreover, practical and functional concerns point in different directions. Limiting judicial review to the record provided to a court or that the agency relied on risks giving agencies incentives to include and consider only materials supporting their decisions, but including all the material before the agency or all the material the agency considered risks producing a massive record that is highly burdensome to generate, overwhelms courts, and obscures the main bases of the agency’s decisionmaking.145 Roberts avoided this issue by relying on the fact that the government had not challenged the district court’s conclusion that the administrative record was incomplete and stipulated to the addition of substantial new material.146

140 This extra-record evidence was most discussed by Justice Breyer, who quoted in passing from the deposition of the DOJ official who wrote the DOJ letter. Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2595 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).
142 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2574–76.
143 The requirement of on-the-record decisionmaking means that identifying the record is not an issue with respect to formal proceedings. See 5 USC § 556(e); Jeffrey S. Lubbers, A Guide to Federal Agency Rulemaking 287–302 (ABA 5th ed 2012).
145 See Brandon, 21 Lewis & Clark L Rev at 1012–17 (cited in note 144) (arguing in favor of supplementing the record provided “the plaintiff provides reasonable proof that the agency considered the evidence” as “practical and workable”); Gavoor and Platt, 67 Kansas L Rev at 69–75 (cited in note 144) (listing negative consequences to allowing supplementation with other evidence considered by the agency).
146 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2574.
Yet the result in Department of Commerce may make the government less willing to do so in the future.

Justice Thomas’s insistence that pretext inquiries are strangers to administrative law is also only partially correct. It’s true that arbitrary and capriciousness review does not usually speak in terms of pretext and the Supreme Court had not previously held agency action arbitrary and capricious on pretext grounds.\footnote{Lower courts had, albeit rarely. See, for example, Texas v United States, 809 F3d 134, 171–76 (5th Cir 2015) (upholding the district court’s determination that justification given for Department of Homeland Security’s Deferred Action for Parents of Americans and Lawful Permanent Residents was “pretext”); James Madison Ltd v Ludwig, 82 F3d 1085, 1096 (DC Cir 1996) (bad faith is “material to determining whether the Government acted arbitrarily”); Tummino v Hamburg, 936 F Supp 2d 162, 188, 194–97 (EDNY 2013) (concluding FDA denial of citizen petition was arbitrary and capricious because agency acted in bad faith and provided pretextual explanation).} But Thomas downplays the way that arbitrary and capriciousness review serves to identify pretextual decisionmaking without calling it such. Take, for instance, Motor Vehicle Association v State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance, the case that set out the modern arbitrary and capriciousness standard. There, the National Highway Traffic and Safety Administration had justified rescinding its automotive passive restraint rule entirely on the grounds that the rule would not achieve predicted safety benefits. In overturning that rescission, the Court emphasized obvious regulatory alternatives that should have been explored if the agency really were trying to advance safety, as the governing statute required.\footnote{Motor Vehicle Association v State Farm Mutual Mobile Insurance, 463 US 29, 46 (1983) (stating that the agency could not abandon the mandatory passive restraint requirement without first considering an airbag only requirement).} The Court did not put its holding in terms of pretext, instead concluding that the agency was not acting reasonably to achieve its safety goals. However, an implicit corollary of concluding that an agency’s policy undercuts its stated goals is that those goals probably weren’t really motivating the agency in the first place. Chief Justice Rehnquist’s partial dissent in State Farm highlighted this point, accusing the majority of going too far in overturning the agency out of a concern that the agency’s decision was actually driven by political considerations.\footnote{Id at 59 (Rehnquist, CJ, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The agency's changed view of the standard seems to be related to the election of a new President of a different political party.”).} Moreover, approaching pretext as part of a general arbitrary and capriciousness review has the advantage of forestalling the need for an extra-record investigation into a decisionmaker’s subjective motivations, thereby addressing Thomas’s concerns about such inquiries. It similarly avoids the need for courts to specify the extent to which political considerations can legitimately affect agency action, a notoriously difficult line to draw and one courts have long evaded.\footnote{Jennifer Nou notes that pretext, in the form of “rationales masking the genuine motivations for decisions,” especially political motivations, are common in administrative contexts. See Jennifer Nou, Census Symposium: A Place for Pretext in Administrative Law? (SCOTUSBlog, June 28, 2019), archived at https://www.scotusblog.com/2019/06/census-symposium-a-place-for-pretext-in-administrative-law/} Of course, approaching pretext as part of general arbitrary and capriciousness review will fail to police against pretextual rationales in contexts where the agency’s action is otherwise well-supported.\textsuperscript{151} Yet that seems a worthwhile trade-off; at least absent allegations that the undisclosed rationale is invidious, the burdens of extra-record investigation into pretext are harder to defend when the agency action is independently supportable. The real risk in this context is that this independent support will turn out to be manufactured or insubstantial. But that risk can be mitigated by subjecting stated agency rationales to more skeptical and probing scrutiny in the face of evidence of pretextual decisionmaking.

Hence, this surrogate role of arbitrary and capriciousness review highlights again the oddity of Chief Justice Roberts’ split opinion, combining highly deferential review of the substantive basis for adding the citizenship question with invalidation of the decision on pretextual grounds. Justice Breyer’s partial dissent provided the skeptical scrutiny that Roberts’s opinion lacked, closely examining evidence in the record about the impact of the question on different groups. He concluded that the administratively record established that adding the question would only impose costs and yield no benefits; it would “diminish the accuracy of the enumeration of population” while at the same time “produce citizenship data that is less accurate, not more.”\textsuperscript{152} And he rejected the Secretary’s use of uncertainty as a basis for discounting the Census Bureau’s estimates of harmful effects, arguing that uncertainty is endemic in regulatory contexts and does not excuse an agency from not at least explaining why it decided to “take action without ‘engaging in a search for further evidence.’”\textsuperscript{153}

Despite their very different applications of arbitrary and capriciousness review, both Roberts and Breyer, as well as Thomas and Alito, invoked \textit{State Farm} as guiding their analyses. Whether \textit{State Farm} and the Court’s arbitrary and capriciousness precedents require searching scrutiny is a matter of scholarly dispute,\textsuperscript{154} and there are many decisions in which courts stress uncertainty and take a more forgiving stance, as the Supreme Court did here.\textsuperscript{155} The broader point is that arbitrary and capriciousness scrutiny is malleable, with judges able to dial their scrutiny up and down based their assessments of contextual factors in a particular case. For his part, Breyer underscored this malleability, insisting that “[c]ourts do not apply these principles of administrative law mechanically. Rather, they take into account ... the nature and importance of the particular decision, the relevance and importance of missing information, and the inadequacies of a particular explanation in light of their importance.”\textsuperscript{156}

3. \textit{Politics, Deference, and Discretion}. What then led some justices in \textit{Department of Commerce} to dial down their scrutiny of the substantive reasonableness of Ross’s decisionmaking

\textsuperscript{151} See \textit{Sierra Club}, 697 F2d at 408 (acknowledging and accepting the risk that “undisclosed Presidential prodding may direct an outcome that is factually based on the record, but different from the outcome that would have obtained in the absence of Presidential involvement”).

\textsuperscript{152} \textit{Department of Commerce}, 139 S Ct at 2584 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{153} Id at 2590 (quoting \textit{State Farm}, 463 US at 52).

\textsuperscript{154} Jacob Gersen and Adrian Vermeule, \textit{Thin Rationality Review}, 114 Mich L Rev 1355, 1358–59 (2016) (arguing that the Supreme Court overwhelmingly applies a much less searching scrutiny under arbitrary and capriciousness review than is generally acknowledged).

\textsuperscript{156} \textit{Department of Commerce}, 139 S Ct at 2585 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (concluding that the importance of this topic to the functioning of a democratic society warranted searching review).
and others to dial it up? Several factors appeared to be in play, most centrally politics and discretion.

Politics surfaced most prosaically in Justice Thomas’s opinion, with Thomas repeatedly accusing the district court of invalidating the citizenship question out of bias against the Trump Administration. Thomas insisted that only bias could explain the district court’s detailed record review and findings of pretext: “I do not deny that a judge predisposed to distrust the Secretary or the administration could arrange those facts [from the record] on a corkboard and—with a jar of pins and a spool of string—create an eye-catching conspiracy web.” That three Supreme Court justices signed onto such a pointed attack on the impartiality of a lower court judge is extraordinary, all the more so given that five of their colleagues agreed with the district court’s analysis, at least in part. It is also deeply ironic, for by launching this attack these justices were themselves embedding a partisan message in the pages of the U.S. Reports. After all, the prime expositor of the claim that lower court judges who rule against the Trump Administration’s actions are doing so out of bias is President Trump himself.

But politics also appeared in a more principled form, in differing views of the relationship between political accountability and deference to agency policymaking. For Roberts, such deference rests fundamentally on principles of political accountability. Provided the policy choices of an agency’s political leaders are at least plausible, they should be respected. Contrary views of career bureaucrats should get little weight, if not be viewed with outright suspicion. As he put it, “the Census Act authorizes the Secretary, not the [Census] Bureau, to make policy choices within the range of reasonable options.” Indeed, a desire to reaffirm the importance of judicial deference to the policy choices of agencies’ political leadership seems the best explanation of Roberts’s decision hold that adding the citizenship question per se was not arbitrary and capricious, even as he invalidated Ross’s decision as pretextual. Roberts also made a point of underscoring the legitimacy of political influence in his discussion of pretext, insisting that “a court may not set aside an agency’s policymaking decision solely because it might have been influenced by political considerations or prompted by an Administration’s priorities.” One benefit of Roberts’s split vote is that it allowed him reinforce this structural principle of political control of policy while still protecting the Court from sanctioning blatant manipulations and falsehoods.

Justice Breyer, by contrast, tied deference for discretionary agency decisions closely to expertise and carefully reasoned explanation. He treated the fact that Ross deviated from the recommendations of the agency’s in house experts, the Census Bureau, as grounds for a probing judicial reception. Breyer did not deny that an agency’s head’s “policy choice between two reasonable but uncertain options” would deserve deference. But he argued that the Census 157 Id at 2582 (Thomas, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part); see also id at 2576 (Thomas, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“[T]he decision of the district court . . . was transparently based on the application of an administration-specific standard. … The law requires a more impartial approach.”).

159 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2571 (claiming that Breyer “subordinat[ed] the Secretary’s policymaking discretion to the Bureau’s technocratic expertise”).
160 Id at 2573.
161 Id at 2589–92 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).
162 Id at 2593 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).
Bureau’s memos showed that the option of adding the question was not reasonable and the extent of uncertainty was exaggerated. Indeed, far from viewing political accountability as compelling deference here, Breyer argued that letting Ross’s decision stand risked “undermining public confidence in the integrity of our democratic system itself,” given the importance of an accurate census for political representation. Interestingly, Justice Breyer and the liberal justices concurring with him appeared far more amenable to connecting politics and deference in Kisor. There, they joined Kagan’s opinion tying deference to authoritative interpretations by agency heads and identifying political accountability as a basis for deference. This divergence is potentially explainable on the grounds that Kisor did not involve a conflict between political accountability and expertise, but unfortunately the contrast was never addressed by Breyer—leaving the impression that opposition to adding the citizenship question may have animated his more stringent scrutiny here.

Similarly, the conservative justices’ emphasis on political accountability as grounds for deference seems in tension with Justice Gorsuch’s identification of the political nature of agency decisionmaking as counting strongly against deference in Kisor. Justice Thomas explained the difference between the two cases as lying in the nature of the agency decision at issue: a discretionary policy choice versus an interpretation of law. Whereas deference to agency legal interpretations violated Article III, deference to agency discretionary decisions reflected “a ‘presumption of regularity’” for the Executive out of “respect for a coordinate branch of government whose officers not only take an oath to support the Constitution, as we do, ... but also are charged with faithfully executing our laws.” Justice Alito went even further, arguing that the broad discretion Congress gave the Secretary of Commerce over the content of the census meant that courts had no jurisdiction to review the Secretary’s decisionmaking at all.

Although this emphasis on discretion helped align the conservative justices’ stances in Department of Commerce and Kisor, it highlighted a conflict between Department of Commerce and Gundy. In Gundy, Justice Gorsuch’s dissent—joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Thomas—argued strongly that broad congressional delegations of authority to the executive branch were unconstitutional: Congress can delegate to the executive power to “fill up the details” once “Congress had announced the controlling general policy”; Congress can also delegate factfinding responsibilities and assign “wide discretion” over matters in which the executive independently enjoys broad authority, such as foreign affairs. But what Congress cannot do is delegate to the executive power to “make the policy judgments” incorporated in “generally applicable rules of conduct governing future actions by private persons.” Plainly, the responsibilities delegated to the Secretary under the Census Act are far more policy-laden than just factfinding, and decades of dispute over including a question on citizenship make clear that adding it cannot be seen as just filling up the details of the census either. Responsibility for the census is constitutionally assigned to Congress and not an area of inherent executive authority. Moreover, 163 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2592–93 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).

---

164 Id at 2585 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).
165 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2578 n 3 (Thomas, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).
166 Id at 2579–80 (Thomas, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (internal quotations omitted). See also Michigan, 135 S Ct at 2712 (Thomas, J, concurring) (arguing that deference on legal questions violates Article III).
167 Id at 2597 (Alito, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).
168 Gundy, 139 S Ct at 2136–37 (Gorsuch, J, dissenting).
169 Id at 2133, 2141 (Gorsuch, J, dissenting).
private persons are required to fill out the census, and the fact that not responding to the census is considered a misdemeanor creates another parallel to Gundy, though the criminal consequences of violating the statute at issue there were far more severe. In short, the breadth of discretion given to the Secretary that the conservative justices rely on to justify deference in Department of Commerce appears to be precisely the kind of delegation that several of them would have held unconstitutional in Gundy. Yet they never acknowledged, let alone explained, this inconsistency.

II. The Many Isms of Roberts Court Administrative Law

The Roberts Court is clearly conflicted when it comes to administrative law. Kisor and Department of Commerce showcase a Court divided on administrative law substance and methodology, with the Justices diverging notably even when they ostensibly agree on the governing legal framework. Moreover, these divides frequently map the growing ideological and partisan divides on the Court: The 2018 term found Justice Kagan often leading the liberal Democratic-appointed justices in defending established administrative law, while Justice Gorsuch was often at the forefront of the conservative Republican-appointed justices in attacking existing doctrine and Chief Justice Roberts stood squarely in the middle. Given that administrative law cases frequently carry high political stakes, such a stark ideological and partisan divide should be particularly troubling for those worried about the Court being seen as a politicized actor. The Justices’ flipped stances on deference between these two cases reinforces that politicized appearance.

Drill further down, and several analytic tensions become apparent. These are familiar analytic divides from public law more broadly, but their appearance in the administrative law context is more recent. These tensions—between formalism and anti-formalism, originalism and more general historicism, textualism and common law development—provide the intellectual underpinnings for today’s battles over administrative law. Yet it is hard to see these divisions as driving Roberts Court administrative law. In particular, these analytic tensions do not consistently map onto the justices’ line-ups in administrative law cases or the ideological divisions on the Court.

A. Formalism and Non-Formalism

The first clearly evident conceptual divide centers on formalism. One group of justices is deeply formalist in approach across a range of administrative law issues, while another is resolutely non-formalist. Non-formalism on the Roberts Court is hard to define specifically; it encompasses a range of approaches from legal realism, to pragmatism, functionalism, and minimalism. The 2018 Term decisions suggest that while formalism has a greater presence on the Court now than for many decades, it has yet to secure a committed majority.

170 13 USC § 221.
171 Justice Alito did not join Gorsuch’s opinion in Gundy, and Justice Kavanaugh did not participate in the case.
172 On the growing ideological and partisan divide, see generally Neal Devins and Lawrence Baum, Split Definitive: How Party Polarization Turned the Supreme Court into A Partisan Court, 2016 Sup Ct Rev 301 (2016).
173 See Claire Brockway and Bradley Jones, Partisan Gap Widens in Views of the Supreme Court (Pew Research Center, Aug 7, 2019) (“[T]hree-quarters of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents have a favorable opinion of the Supreme Court, compared with only about half (49%) of Democrats and Democratic leaners.”).
1. Legal Realism versus Legal Formalism. Underlying current disputes over deference to administrative determinations lies a fundamental disagreement on the nature of legal interpretation and the relationship of law and policy.\(^{174}\) This is clearest in Kisor. There, Justice Gorsuch portrayed law as fixed, determinate, and categorically distinct from policy.\(^{175}\) This categorical distinction between law and policy, and correspondingly between legal interpretation and policy choice, was essential for his argument that deference to agency regulatory interpretations violates Article III. That argument hinged on the Marbury claim that “[i]t is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is,”\(^{176}\) along with an insistence that courts must exercise independent judgment in order to adequately perform this law declaring function.\(^{177}\) But if regulatory interpretation constitutes policy choice to a significant degree, such interpretation appears less the type of law-declaring activity that on Gorsuch’s account is constitutionally assigned to the courts’ independent purview and into which the political branches may not intrude.\(^{178}\)

Justice Kagan’s statement in Kisor that “sometimes … law runs out,” leaving “policy-laden choice”\(^{179}\) at first might suggest a similar view of law and policy as distinct entities. But her argument was actually the opposite. Her insistence that regulatory ambiguity is inevitable, and that law is incomplete and cannot resolve all legal disputes, painted law and legal interpretation as intrinsically linked to policy choice. And she moved from arguing that legal interpretation in the context of regulatory ambiguity involves policy choice to the claim that in many instances Congress would likely want that policy choice to rest in the hands of an expert, experienced agency. From there, Auer deference followed.

The classical image of law as fixed, determinate, and categorically distinct from policy is highly formalist, whereas the view of law as indeterminate and inevitably entailing policy choice typifies legal realism.\(^{180}\) The terms of this debate are thus familiar, but its surfacing today is more surprising. The legal realist view of law has dominated administrative law ever since the cementing of the administrative state in the 1940s;\(^{181}\) Adrian Vermeule has described the ensuing

---

\(^{175}\) See text accompanying note 73.

\(^{176}\) Marbury v Madison, 5 US (1 Cranch) 137, 177 (1803).

\(^{177}\) Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2437–38 (Kagan, J) (plurality). Whether declaring the law necessarily entails exercising independent judgment is much disputed. Justice Kagan argued in Kisor that judges also can declare the meaning of law by determining that the law assigns primary interpretive responsibility to another institution of government. But the Court has come to read Marbury as standing for a requirement of independent judgment and judicial supremacy in constitutional interpretation. See Cooper v Aaron, 358 US 1, 18 (1958); Henry P. Monaghan, Marbury and the Administrative State, 83 Colum L Rev 1, 9–10 (1983).

\(^{178}\) Not surprisingly, therefore, Justice Thomas has articulated a similarly firm divide between law and policy in his opinions arguing that deference to agency statutory and regulatory interpretations is unconstitutional. See Michigan v EPA, 135 S Ct 2699, 2712 (2015) (Thomas, J, concurring).

\(^{179}\) Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2415 (Kagan, J) (plurality).

\(^{180}\) See Frederick Schauer, Formalism, 97 Yale L J 509, 510–15 (1988); see also Frederick Schauer, Legal Realism Untamed, 91 Tex L Rev 749, 754–56 (2013); see also Brian Z. Tamanaha, Understanding Legal Realism, 87 Tex L Rev 731, 732 (2009).

\(^{181}\) See Cass R. Sunstein, Essay, Beyond Marbury: The Executive's Power to Say What the Law Is, 115 Yale L J 2580, 2593–95, 2598 (2006); see also Richard Pildes, Institutional Formalism and Realism in Constitutional and Public Law, 2013 Sup Ct Rev 1, 21–30 (describing movement between institutional realism and institutional formalism in years as a time of law’s ever-growing abnegation, with law pushed to the margins as more and more decisions appeared in a policy guise better fit for agencies than courts. Even when formalism made a comeback in related public law fields, as occurred with the advent of textualism in statutory interpretation in the 1980s, ordinary administrative law retained its realist orientation. After all, it was in 1984 that the Chevron Court justified deference to reasonable agency interpretations of ambiguous statutory provisions, arguing that in those contexts interpretation entails a policy choice implicitly delegated to the agency.

In its current incarnation in Roberts Court administrative law, legal realism surfaces in a domesticated legal process guise. Law is not portrayed as entirely or necessarily indeterminate; even realist-inclined justices often conclude that agency statutory interpretations fail Chevron and are not deserving of deference. Moreover, Justice Kagan’s arguments for deference in Kisor echo legal process’s focus on a rational Congress and the institutional capacities of courts and agencies. Critically, moreover, Kagan ties deference not to abstract institutional features, but instead to judicial determinations of whether particular decisions reflect agencies’ comparative institutional advantages. Richard Pildes has used the term “institutional realism” to capture this sensitivity to “how these institutions actually function in, and over, time.” Justice Breyer’s opinion in Department of Commerce is to the same effect: Deference turns on whether a specific agency decision shows expertise and informed, thorough consideration; it does not follow automatically from the fact that the decision represents a policy question or was made by a politically accountable actor.

By contrast, legal formalism in Roberts Court administrative law takes a categorical approach to policy questions as well as legal questions. Two distinct formalist approaches to policy are evident in this Term’s decisions. On the one hand, there is Justice Gorsuch’s separation of powers formalism in Gundy, which classifies broad policy determinations as categorically legislative and constitutionally excluded from agencies’ ambit. On the other, there is Justice Thomas’s effort in Department of Commerce to preserve an arena for administrative policy judgments largely immune from judicial review, at the same time as he would banish policy from the world of law. Justice Kavanaugh signaled a similar effort in Kisor when he urged courts to “engage in appropriately rigorous scrutiny of an agency’s interpretation of a regulation, and ... simultaneously be appropriately deferential to an agency’s reasonable policy choices within the administrative law); Pojanowski, 133 Harv L Rev at *4 (cited in note 174) (noting “the working, moderate legal realism that characterizes much mainstream administrative law”).

182 Vermeule, Law’s Abnegation at 10 (cited in note 155).
185 See William N. Eskridge, Jr and Philip P. Frickey, The Making of the Legal Process, 107 Harv L Rev 2031, 2042–45 (1994) (arguing that legal process was a synthesis of legal realism and other pre-WW II intellectual traditions, and describing legal process’s core intellectual commitments as “the reasoned elaboration of purposive law,” “law as an institutional system,” and “the centrality of process”) (capitalization omitted).
186 See, for example, Sturgeon v Frost, 139 S Ct 1066, 1080 n 3 (2019) (Kagan, J) (“Because we see ... no ambiguity as to Section 103(c)’s meaning, we cannot give deference to the Park Service’s contrary construction” under Chevron).
187 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2416 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
189 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2595 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).

29
discretion allowed by a regulation.”

Jeffrey Pojanowski has offered a sustained analytic defense of such a conjoined approach, which he terms neoclassical administrative law. The aim is precisely “to sharpen the line between law and policy in administrative law, with the consequence of increasing judicial responsibility on questions of law while decreasing it on matters [of] policymaking discretion.”

At first glance, a neoclassical approach might seem to offer a happy compromise of formalism and realism, respecting constitutional lines and also comparative institutional strengths. But combining legal formalism and policy deference in this fashion is unlikely to succeed. Any sharp demarcation between questions of law and questions of policy is implausible—as a practical as well as a conceptual matter. In an increasingly statutory and regulatory world such as ours, policy choices rarely surface in law-free zones. The choices judges will make in construing law will inevitably significantly curtail the space left for policy. Although Kavanaugh argued that “open-ended terms like ‘reasonable,’ ‘appropriate,’ ‘feasible’ or ‘practicable’ ... afford agencies broad policy discretion,” courts accustomed to definitively resolving interpretive ambiguity on their own may find these terms to have definite legal content as well. Moreover, the arguments for deference to agencies on fact and policy matters—such as agencies’ greater political accountability, expertise, or congressional authorization—also push towards deference in law application, which easily spills over into law interpretation. As Vermeule has put it, “[i]logically, there [i]s no necessary contradiction” between courts according deference to agencies on ordinary fact questions and exercising independent judgment on questions of law, but “the deep premises and attitude of each [a]re inconsistent with the deep premises and attitude of the other.” In like vein, Kristin Hickman, and Nicholas Bednar contend that recognition of the institutional benefits of agency policymaking make something akin to Chevron deference inevitable. Even on a more theoretical plane, legal formalism and broad policy deference to agencies do not easily combine. Legal formalism goes hand-in-hand with a broader separation of powers formalism that, as noted, views agency policy determinations as executive branch usurpation of the legislative power.

2. Formalism, Functionalism, and Remedial Minimalism in Separation of Powers Analysis. Although legal determinacy formalism was largely absent on the Court until recently, formalism has had a steady presence in separation of powers analysis. Separation of powers formalism evinces the same commitment to categorical lines, with the relevant lines here being constitutional distinctions among legislative, executive, and judicial power, each of which is 190 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2449 (Kavanaugh, J, concurring in the judgment). See also Brett M. Kavanaugh, Fixing Statutory Interpretation, 129 Harv L Rev 2118, 2153–54 (2016) (“This very important principle sometimes gets lost: a judge can engage in appropriately rigorous scrutiny of an agency’s statutory interpretation and simultaneously be very deferential to an agency’s policy choices within the discretion granted to it by the statute.”).

---

191 Pojanowski, 133 Harv L Rev at *24 (cited in note 174).

192 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2448 (Kavanaugh, J, concurring in the judgment).

193 See, for example, Michigan, 135 S Ct at 2707–08 (reading “appropriate” in provision of the Clean Air Act as requiring EPA to consider costs in making initial decision to regulate); MetLife v Financial Stability Oversight Council, 177 F Supp 3d 219, 239–41 (DDC 2016) (statutory provision requiring agency to consider “any other risk-related factor” it deems “appropriate” to consider costs to company of being subject to regulation).

194 Cass Sunstein argues that pre-Chevron decisions granting deference to agency statutory interpretations represented such law application. Cass R. Sunstein, Chevron as Law, 107 Georgetown L J 1613, 1649 (2019); see, for example, NLRB v Hearst Publications Inc, 322 US 111, 130 (1944); Gray v Powell 314 US 402, 412 (1941).

195 Vermeule, Law’s Abnegation at 28 (cited in note 155).

viewed as formally vested in one branch of government with intermixing limited to those instances expressly sanctioned in the Constitution. By contrast, a more functionalist analysis views powers as overlapping, emphasizes the overall balance among the branches, and focuses on the benefits of a particular governmental structure and that structure’s impact on a branch’s ability to perform its core functions. As many commentators have argued, formalism and functionalism should not be viewed as opposed approaches in the separation of powers context; most decisions have elements of both orientations, and both approaches share key elements, such as a concern about aggrandized power. Yet still, they represent discrete stances between which the Court alternates in its separation of powers jurisprudence.

These formalist and functionalist orientations were clearly on display this term. Justice Gorsuch’s opinions in Gundy and Kisor were paradigms of formalist separation of powers analysis, arguing that the Constitution’s text draws clear lines between the distinct categories of executive, legislative, and judicial power. Yet he ultimately justified strict enforcement of the Constitution’s distribution of powers in teleological terms, in particular as essential to protecting individual liberty and guarding against “arbitrary use of governmental power.” Kagan barely engaged Gorsuch’s lengthy constitutional attack on Auer, but her dismissive response was largely functionalist, noting that the Court had long upheld mixing of executive and judicial functions in agencies and emphasizing that judges were able to check agency regulation interpretations under Auer. Functionalism also dominated Kagan’s constitutional defense of delegation in Gundy, where she offered a vision of separation of powers that stressed flexibility, practicality, and effectiveness before reframing the case as being about statutory interpretation rather than constitutional structure. And Chief Justice Roberts elevated realism over formalism in Department of Commerce, when he insisted that the Court was not naïve and would not fall for Ross’s contrived VRA justification.

Although in the 2018 Term formalist arguments fell short, at other times the Roberts Court has taken a formalist approach to separation of powers and constitutional structural analysis generally. Examples include two leading opinions written by Chief Justice Roberts: Free Enterprise Fund, which imposed a categorical prohibition on double for cause removal protection; and Stern v Marshall, which drew a bright-line distinction between public and private rights for 199 Gundy, 139 S Ct at 2133 (Gorsuch, J, dissenting).

200 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2348 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment); Gundy, 139 S Ct at 2133–35, 2142 (Gorsuch, J, dissenting).
201 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2421–22 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
202 Gundy, 139 S Ct at 2123 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
203 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2576.
purposes of determining when adjudication outside of the Article III courts is constitutional. Yet there have also been notable instances when the Court has taken a more functionalist stance. In NLRB v Noel Canning, the Court took a pragmatic approach to interpreting the scope of the Recess Appointments Clause, justifying its reading as necessary to serve the Clause’s purpose and supported by longstanding practice. And in Wellness International Network v Sharif, the Court held that consent of the parties can make some forms of non-Article III adjudication constitutional, insisting that analysis of this “question must be decided not by ‘formalist and unbending rules,’ but ‘with an eye to the practical effect that the’ practice ‘will have on the constitutionally assigned role of the federal judiciary.’” Even the Court’s more formalist decisions can have a heavy functionalist component; a key driver of Free Enterprise, for example, is “the Court’s own functional assessment of how much accountability executive officers properly owe to the President.”

As important, even the Roberts Court’s formalistic separation of powers decisions are often cabined in ways that suggest concern with minimizing their practical impact. Free Enterprise Fund and Stern are again good examples of this phenomenon. In Free Enterprise, Roberts’s majority opinion took a minimalist approach to remedying its finding that double for cause removal protection for members of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board was unconstitutional, signaling in the process that it was not calling single-for-cause protection into question. Insisting that the unconstitutional double-for-cause provision could be severed while leaving the Board otherwise intact, the Court rejected greater “blue-pencil[ing]” of Sarbanes-Oxley Act provisions as a job “belong[ing] to the Legislature, not the Judiciary.” In a similar vein, Roberts’s majority opinion in Stern not only suggested a carve out for administrative adjudication, but also retained a broad definition of public right and reaffirmed precedents that sanctioned a broad role for non-Article III adjudication. The question of whether to continue with this minimalist approach to remedying separation of powers violations is now before the Court, with the justices adding a question on severability to their consideration of the constitutionality of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau’s a single-director structure.

---

205 Free Enterprise Fund, 561 US at 492; Stern v Marshall, 564 US 462, 483–84 (2011). Although the Court’s formalism often leads to invalidation of the challenged measure, that result is not universal. Recently in Oil States Energy Services, LLC v Greene’s Energy Group, LLC, the Court adhered to a formalist distinction between private and public rights yet nonetheless upheld the non-Article III method of administrative adjudication at issue. 138 S Ct 1365, 1373 (2018). And on occasion a more functionalist analysis leads to invalidation, as in Lucia v SEC when the Court focused on the specific functions and responsibilities of administrative law judges at the SEC in concluding that they were inferior officers. 138 S Ct 2044, 2052–54 (2018).

211 See Seila Law LLC v Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, No 19-7, 2019 WL 5281290, at *1 (US Oct 18, 2019) (directing the parties to address whether “[i]f the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau is found unconstitutional on the basis of the separation of powers, can 12 USC § 5491(c)(3) be severed from the Dodd-Frank Act?”).
Such remedial minimalism might seem at first to be functionalist, insofar as it tailors the constitutional remedies to limit disruption and preserve as much of Congress’s work as possible. Formalist separation of powers decisions are famous for casting aside analogous concerns of convenience, efficiency and utility in service of upholding separation of power principles. On the other hand, rejection of greater remedial creativity as outside of the judicial role sounds in a formalist register. More significantly, remedial minimalism is likely critical for the success of separation of powers formalism in practice. Otherwise, adoption of separation of powers formalism might well entail substantial transformation in the national administrative state, as Justice Gorsuch suggested in his Kisor and Gundy opinions—a result that might make a majority of the Court less willing to sustain formalist arguments. From this perspective, remedial minimalism appears primarily as a strategic device, one that makes separation of powers formalism more palatable, even if analytically more aligned with functionalism.

* * *

In short, the Roberts Court is simultaneously formalist and nonformalist approach in its approach to administrative law. Greater coherence exists within the two ideological camps, with conservatives often taking a more formalist view and the liberals being more non-formalist and specifically functionalist in orientation. Even here, however, there are noteworthy inconsistencies. Several conservative justices have signed onto opinions stating deference to agency legal interpretations can be constitutional, as well as taken a minimalist or even functionalist approach to separation of powers. And the same is true of the Roberts Court liberals, who at times have been willing to pull back on deference or adopt formalist approaches to separation of powers. These inconsistencies in part reflect the fact that anti-administrativist views have been gradually emerging, as well as strategic defensive compromises. But the overall effect is to suggest a court deciding cases on a somewhat ad hoc basis.

B. Originalism and Historicism

A second prominent feature of many Roberts Court administrative law opinions is their focus on the past. To some extent, this is simply a manifestation of originalism’s increased role in Roberts Court constitutional analysis, combined with the heavy constitutional flavor of attacks on 213 See, for example, Pereira, 138 S Ct at 2121 (Alito, J, dissenting) (criticizing the Court for not adhering to Chevron); City of Arlington, 569 US at 317–18 (Alito and Kennedy, JJ, joining dissent by Roberts, CJ, arguing that deference to agency legal interpretations is compatible with courts’ law declaring role if Congress has delegated such authority).

214 See text accompanying notes 209–212; Wellness Networks, 135 S Ct at 1949 (Alito, J, concurring in the judgment in part); PHH Corp v Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, 839 F3d 1, 30–36 (2016) (Kavanaugh, J, dissenting from decision en banc) (making the functionalist argument that an agency headed by a single director with for cause removal protection lacks the checks on abuse of power of multimember-headed independent agencies and is unconstitutional).

215 See, for example, Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2414–18 (Kagan, J) (plurality) (limiting Auer deference); Oil States, 138 S Ct at 1379–80 (Breyer, Ginsburg, and Sotomayor, JJ, concurring in opinion upholding administrative adjudication on purely originalist public rights grounds; Kagan, J, concurred without separate opinion); Noel Canning, 573 US at 550 (adopting bright-line rule that “the Senate is in session when it says it is, provided that, under its own rules, it retains the capacity to transact Senate business”).
established administrative law.\textsuperscript{216} The historical lens often extends beyond the Founding, however, to include consideration of judicial precedent and sometimes governmental practice over the nineteenth century. This wider scope reflects broader trends in constitutional interpretation and originalist scholarship, in particular emphasis on political branch practices as constructing constitutional meaning or liquidating constitutional meaning over time.\textsuperscript{217} As Sophia Lee has suggested, this wider historical orientation also reflects anti-administrativists’ view of the nation’s first century as a period of limited administrative government and judicial ascendance in enforcing the law.\textsuperscript{218}

In prior terms, Justice Thomas has most consistently and comprehensively developed the originalist attack on modern administrative law. In the 2018 Term, this role fell to Justice Gorsuch. Originalism underlies Gorsuch’s formalist account of law and the judicial power in Kisor, but especially dominates his Gundy dissent, which opens with a lengthy discussion of the Framers’ views of constitutional structure, legislative power, and their fear of excessive law-making.\textsuperscript{219} Gorsuch also takes a wider historical lens, however. In Kisor, he examined the Court’s precedents on deference over the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries to show that Auer was a historical aberration.\textsuperscript{220} Similarly, in Gundy he reviewed the Court’s delegation jurisprudence over time to show that, even if the Court upheld delegations, it nonetheless adhered to his account of the narrow bounds of constitutional delegation until the 1940s. Indeed, in both opinions Gorsuch portrays the post-New Deal ear of the 1940s as a period of sharp break from longstanding traditions.\textsuperscript{221}

No doubt, Justice Gorsuch’s engagement with nineteenth and early twentieth century jurisprudence is in part a strategic effort to rebut what on the surface seem strong stare decisis arguments for retaining current administrative law doctrines. Yet this engagement is also evidence of the limited sway originalism actually has in Roberts Court opinions attacking the administrative state. Indeed, despite its frequent invocation, originalism often has a superficial cast in these opinions, surfacing primarily in claims that administrative government is at odds with the general separation of powers principles and concerns of the framers, rather than in evidence of originalist rejection of specific practices.\textsuperscript{222} A prime example is Gorsuch’s opinion in Gundy, which based its

\textsuperscript{219}Gundy, 139 S Ct at 2133–36 (Gorsuch, J, dissenting).
\textsuperscript{220}Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2426–30 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
\textsuperscript{221}Gundy, 139 S Ct at 2137–39 (Gorsuch, J, dissenting); Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2426–29 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
\textsuperscript{222}See Metzger, 131 Harv L Rev at 45–46 (cited in note 11). An exception is Oil States, where both Justice Thomas’s majority opinion and Justice Gorsuch’s dissent discussed original practices relating to the granting and rescinding of patents in detail. 138 S Ct at 1377; id at 1381–83 (Gorsuch, J, dissenting).}
nondelegation arguments on abstract accounts of the framers’ views of constitutional structure and legislative power, rather than focusing on actual delegations from the period.\textsuperscript{223}

Interestingly, the historical lens is not limited to administrative law’s opponents. Administrative law’s judicial defenders often adopt a historicist stance as well. To be sure, they give more weight to recent history than their anti-administrative colleagues, but recent history for these purposes often stretches back eighty to ninety years. Thus, in \textit{Kisor} and \textit{Gundy} Justice Kagan emphasized lines of precedents dating back to the 1940s and before that upheld deference to agencies’ regulatory interpretations and broad delegations.\textsuperscript{224} Perhaps the starkest historicist defense of established administrative arrangements came in Justice Breyer’s 2014 majority opinion in \textit{NLRB v Noel Canning}. In that case, Breyer drew on political branch practices going back to Founding as well as the post-World War II period to hold that the recess appointment power could be used during an intrasession recess and with respect to vacancies that existed before the recess commenced.\textsuperscript{225} Moreover, Breyer expressly justified historical practice as particularly important in separation of powers challenges, a marked contrast to his view four years earlier in \textit{Free Enterprise Fund} that historical practices at the time of the Founding did not offer “significant help” in assessing a separation of powers challenge to removal protections.\textsuperscript{226}

In short, justices of all stripes are increasingly looking to past practices and historical precedents in administrative law cases. \textit{Department of Commerce} showcased this trend too. There, both Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Thomas emphasized the long historical practice of including a citizenship question on the census as far back as 1782, with Roberts holding that this “early understanding ... and long practice” meant that asking about citizenship did not violate the Enumeration Clause.\textsuperscript{227} Justice Breyer similarly relied on the history of the census, but the historical account he offered put prime emphasis on transformations in how the census was conducted after 1950, in response to concerns about high undercounting rates.\textsuperscript{228}

Historical battles also dominate recent administrative law scholarship. Prominent attacks on administrative government by Philip Hamburger, Joseph Postell, and others argue that current national administrative government marks a stark departure from expectations and practices at the Founding through the nineteenth century.\textsuperscript{229} Their accounts are disputed by historians offering numerous studies of administrative governance dating back just as far.\textsuperscript{230} The extent of judicial deference to administrative legal interpretations is an issue of particular historical dispute. In an article cited by Justice Gorsuch in \textit{Kisor}, Aditya Bamzai contends that before the 1940s the Supreme Court did not have a tradition of deferring to executive interpretations, as Justice Scalia

\begin{thebibliography}{9}
\bibitem{Kisor} Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2411–12 & nn 2–3 (Kagan, J) (plurality); \textit{Gundy}, 139 S Ct at 2129–30 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
\bibitem{Noel Canning} Noel Canning, 573 US at 524–26, 528–33, 543.
\bibitem{Free Enterprise Fund} Free Enterprise Fund, 561 US at 518.
\bibitem{Noel Canning Recess} 139 S Ct at 2567, 2577.
\bibitem{Noel Canning Recess dissent} Id at 2585–87 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).
\bibitem{Historical} See generally, for example, Philip Hamburger, \textit{Is Administrative Law Unlawful?} (Chicago 2014); Joseph Postell, \textit{Bureaucracy in America: The Administrative State’s Challenge to Constitutional Government} (Missouri 2017), see also Richard Epstein, \textit{The Dubious Morality of the Modern Administrative State} (Manhattan Institute 2019).
\end{thebibliography}
among others had maintained. Instead, the Court “‘respected’ longstanding and contemporaneous executive interpretations of law as part of a practice of deferring to longstanding and contemporaneous interpretation generally.”

Disagreeing with Bamzai, Craig Green maintains that the Court’s jurisprudence is more varied and supportive of deference to executive actors, identifying instances in which the Court suggested that “the construction given to a statute by those charged with the duty of executing it is always entitled to the most respectful consideration.” And Lee argues that early administrative agencies “had the first and often final word on the Constitution’s meaning” such that “reinstating the 19th century constitutional order ... would all but eliminate judicial review of [agency] actions’ constitutionality.”

This historical scholarship holds important lessons for current debates over administrative law and the administrative state more broadly. The extensive history of administrative agencies operating from the nation’s beginnings to today undercuts efforts to paint contemporary administrative government as a fundamental deviation from the Constitution. To be sure, the extent of administrative authority existing before the twentieth century is disputed. In addition, much of the early national administrative state was developmental and distributional, with many administrative agencies operating in the territories or implementing administrative regimes that involved matters of public right.

Still, too many early examples exist of broad administrative discretion, coercive administrative actions targeting private rights, and limited judicial review to justify accounts that portray administrative government and administrative law as twentieth century aberrations.

Moreover, it is unclear why the public right focus and territorial operation of early administrative regimes should limit their historical significance. Those were the primary contexts in which the national government of the time was active, and its actions had tremendous importance for the individuals affected. Although some administrative skeptics view this history as suggesting that administrative power to regulate and adjudicate private rights is 235 Some examples from Jerry Mashaw include the 1807–09 Embargo, operation of the Land Office, and steamship regulation in the 1850s. Mashaw, Creating, at 91–143, 192–208, 216–18 (cited in note 230). Ann Woolhandler maintains that the “[u]sing the right/privilege theory to explain older patterns in judicial review is problematic,” noting that “the Court sometimes reviewed government exactions affecting private rights under the deferential res judicata model. At other times, the Court accorded rigorous judicial review in cases seeking remedies for denials of government benefits or largesse.” Judicial Deference to Administrative Action, 43 Admin L Rev 197, 231–34 (1991).

---

236 For a discussion of the importance of the territories to contemporary debates over administrative law and to the lives of many Americans in the nation’s early years, see Gregory Ablavsky, Administrative Constitutionalism in the Northwest Territory, 167 U Pa L Rev 1631, 1633–36 (2019).
limited, an alternative lesson to draw is that the national government has always relied on agencies when it decides to act. And it is possible to understand many forms of contemporary regulation, particularly those involving permits and licenses or that create statutory rights and obligations, as modern-day versions of public rights—indeed, for many decades the Supreme Court has taken just such an approach. Thus, even if this history is viewed as limited to public rights, it would still carry substantial relevance in establishing the historical legitimacy of administrative governance.

Hence, originalism and historicism may turn out to be powerful tools in administrative government’s defense. At the same time, framing the defense of administrative law and administrative government in historical terms has the downside of suggesting that the acceptable bounds and forms of administrative action are set by what has been done before. This leads to novelty and innovation being viewed as indications that an administrative arrangement is constitutionally suspect, a position advanced in several Roberts Court opinions. But as the DC Circuit recently stated, such a view is at odds with the Court’s separation of powers jurisprudence, which has often sustained measures that were novel in their day. Nor is such a constraint easily squared with the Constitution’s text, which gives Congress broad power to structure government as it sees fit.

A historical lens can also stand in tension with efforts to rethink constitutional and administrative law to better fit current realities. This tension is particularly acute when the historical lens is an originalist one, as the worlds of 1789 and 2019 are far apart when it comes to the shape and responsibilities of national government. But even a more limited backwards-looking gaze may ill-fit efforts to address the governance crises of today. Two of the most salient characteristics of contemporary national government are the deep political polarization that has stymied congressional action on pressing issues and increasingly bold assertions of presidential power that undercut established administrative practices and legal regimes. Although both have surfaced in earlier eras, their combination and intensity today create governance challenges that did not exist even a generation ago, and their resolution may necessitate experimenting with structural arrangements at odds with traditional governmental models.

237 See, for example, Hamburger, Is Administrative Law Unlawful? at 198–202 (cited in note 229) (acknowledging the historical administrative adjudication of patent rights but distinguishing them from other private rights); Gary Lawson, Appointments and Illegal Adjudication: The America Invents Act Through a Constitutional Lens, 2018 Geo Mason L Rev 26, 38–50 (describing nineteenth century cases rejecting the administrative adjudication of land patents and contrasting them with “case law from the past eight decades systematically upholding administrative actions that adjudicate private vested rights”).

238 See Stern, 564 US at 490 (noting “the Court rejected the limitation of the public rights exception to actions involving the Government as a party” but has “limit[ed] the exception to cases in which the claim at issue derives from a federal regulatory scheme, or in which resolution of the claim by an expert Government agency is deemed essential to a limited regulatory objective within the agency's authority”).

240 PHH Corp v Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, 881 F3d 75, 102–03 (DC Cir 2018) (en banc) (noting that the independent counsel, the FTC, and the Sentencing Commission all represented new arrangements but where upheld as constitutional).

241 See Manning, 128 Harv L Rev at 5–7 (cited in note 208).

242 For an effort to rethink administrative government’s constitutionality along these lines, emphasizing the constitutional implications of the broad delegations that characterize contemporary government, see Metzger, 131 Harv L Rev at 87–94 (cited in note 11).

C. APA Textualism, APA Originalism, and Administrative Common Law

A third analytic contrast in Roberts Court administrative law concerns the different stances the justices take towards the APA and other administrative law statutes. The Roberts Court is often described as textualist in its approach to statutory interpretation, including by the justices themselves.244 Whether this is a wholly accurate description is a matter of debate; the Court has deviated from textualism in several prominent statutory interpretation cases.245 In the administrative law context, at least, the Roberts Court has equivocated between textualist and common-law approaches to major administrative law statutes.

Textualism was supreme in Perez v Mortgage Bankers Association in 2015.246 Although the APA expressly exempts interpretive rules from notice-and-comment rulemaking requirements, D.C. Circuit doctrine had held that once an agency issued a definitive interpretation of a regulation, the agency had to use notice-and-comment rulemaking to change that interpretation.247 The Roberts Court unanimously reversed, with the majority opinion emphasizing that the D.C. Circuit’s approach was “contrary to the clear text of the APA’s rulemaking provisions.”248 Textualism also dominated the Court’s approach to the Freedom of Information Act in Food Marketing Institute v Argus Leader, a 2018 Term decision rejecting a widely-followed lower court interpretation of FOIA’s Exemption 4 as protecting confidential information from disclosure only when disclosure would cause competitive harm. That interpretation, according to Justice Gorsuch’s majority opinion for a 6-3 Court, ignored that “[i]n statutory interpretation disputes, a court’s proper starting point lies in a careful examination of the ordinary meaning and structure of the law itself. Where ... that examination yields a clear answer, judges must stop.”249

Text also featured in Kisor, with Justice Kagan and Justice Gorsuch battling over the meaning of §706. This battle took an originalist cast, focusing on what the APA’s text was understood to mean when originally adopted. Gorsuch drew on the APA’s legislative history and contemporaneous scholarly accounts to argue that the APA was originally understood to require de novo judicial review of legal questions, while Kagan countered with evidence that the APA’s

246 135 S Ct 1199 (2015).
247 See 5 USC § 553(b)(A); Paralyzed Veterans of America v DC Arena LP, 117 F3d 579, 586 (1997).
248 Perez, 135 S Ct at 1206.
249 139 S Ct 2356, 2364, 2366 (2019). In so holding, the Court echoed an earlier Roberts Court decision interpreting FOIA’s Exemption 2, where Justice Kagan’s majority opinion denied that its interpretation was at odds with longstanding lower-court doctrine, but added that even if it were in conflict, “we have no warrant to ignore clear statutory language on the ground that other courts have done so.” Milner v Department of the Navy, 562 US 562, 569–72, 576 (2011).
enactors had intended §706 to restate the existing common-law approach to judicial review. Chief Justice Roberts’s narrow join left this debate over the APA’s meaning in a 4-4 tie. Yet Kisor is fundamentally a reaffirmation of administrative common law. Kagan’s refinement of Auer’s limits for a majority of the Court was the epitome of common law doctrinal elaboration, and upholding the doctrine on stare decisis gave ultimate priority to judicial precedent. For all his textualism with respect to §706, even Justice Gorsuch left room for some judicial development of judicial review doctrine in his embrace of Skidmore and his insistence that Auer violates § 553’s notice-and-comment requirements because of its practical effects, despite the section’s express exception for interpretive rules.

Common law development of judicial review doctrine was further on display in Department of Commerce. Indeed, administrative common law was a constant baseline in the case, with all the justices relying on State Farm despite its expansion of arbitrary and capriciousness review beyond its original meaning. But administrative common law was even more prominent in Chief Justice Roberts’s elaboration of a prohibition on pretext for a majority of the Court—a prohibition that as mentioned above, was implicit in existing case law but not expressly developed. Moreover, despite taking a textual approach to statutory interpretation in other contexts, Roberts never stopped to respond to Justice Thomas’s complaint that such a pretext inquiry and adding extra-record materials had no basis in the APA’s text. Instead, he simply invoked the Court’s precedents for going beyond the record if a strong showing of bad faith is made and the APA’s requirement of reasoned decisionmaking.

Viewing the 2018 term opinions along with earlier precedent, it becomes clear that many of the justices’ views on textualist versus common law interpretations of administrative law statutes do not track their ideological divisions or overall stance on administrative government. Instead, many individual justices largely oscillate between administrative law textualism and a more common law stance, as does the Court as a whole. To some extent, this oscillation may reflect the specific administrative law measures at issue. For example, FOIA’s text is far more detailed and more recently amended than the APA, which helps explain the contrast between Argus Leader on the one hand and Kisor and Department of Commerce on the other, all decided in the 2018 Term. And the Court’s notably greater textualism in Perez than Kisor and Department of Commerce may result from the fact that Perez involved the APA’s procedural requirements rather than its provisions for judicial review. Not only are the APA’s procedural requirements more

---

250 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2419–20 (Kagan, J) (plurality); id at 2435–36 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
251 139 S Ct at 2434–35, 2442–43 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment).
253 See text accompanying notes 147–148.
254 See Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2578–79 (Thomas, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).
255 Id at 2574, 2576.
256 There are exceptions. Justice Breyer fairly consistently adopts a common law approach. See Argus Leader, 139 S Ct at 2368–69 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part); Milner, 562 US at 585–90 (Breyer, J, dissenting), and Justices Thomas and Gorsuch have been more consistently textualist, see for example text accompanying note 254; Gutierrez–Brizuela v Lynch, 834 F3d 1142, 1151 (10th Cir 2016) (Gorsuch, J, concurring).
detailed and specific than its judicial review provisions, but the Court has allowed courts more leeway to develop the latter.\textsuperscript{257}

Significantly, however, such oscillation between APA textualism and administrative common law is not a new phenomenon. For many decades, the Court has periodically rejected administrative common law as being at odds with the APA while simultaneously developing new administrative common law doctrines. Despite this oscillation, the common law approach to the APA has dominated, especially in the area of judicial review.\textsuperscript{258} The paradigm example is \textit{Chevron}, which never referenced §706’s text at all and justified its two-step approach to deference on a combination of imputed congressional intent, precedent, pragmatic factors, and constitutional structure.\textsuperscript{259}

A growing number of scholars now argue for APA originalism and critique the common law approach to the APA.\textsuperscript{260} The arguments against administrative common law range from defenses of textualist statutory interpretation writ large to attacks on the legitimacy of judicial lawmaking to concerns about the harmful effects of specific common-law developed doctrines.\textsuperscript{261} Notably, these critiques are offered by scholars with a range of views about judicial deference to agencies and administrative government more broadly. In particular, prominent defenders of the administrative state have advocated that [courts?] should follow the APA’s original meaning and text.\textsuperscript{262} Critiques of administrative common law also are not limited to the APA; John Brinkerhoff has defended the Roberts Court’s recent FOIA textualism on the grounds that lower courts’ common law interpretations of FOIA wrongly downplayed FOIA’s pro-disclosure orientation and instead imposed a “strong pro-government gloss over nearly all of FOIA.”\textsuperscript{263}

This growing scholarship underscores the potential pitfalls of administrative common law. But as I have argued elsewhere, it is important to separate out the merits and demerits of particular common law doctrines from the general enterprise of administrative common law.\textsuperscript{264} I am skeptical of efforts to broadly replace administrative common law with a textual and originalist \textsuperscript{257} Compare \textit{Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp v Natural Resources Defense Council}, 435 US 519, 524, 542–49 (1978) (insisting that “[a]gencies are free to grant additional procedural rights [beyond those in the APA] . . . but reviewing courts are generally not free to impose them”) with \textit{Chevron}, 467 US at 842–43 (setting out a two-step standard for judicial review of agency statutory interpretations without referencing the APA).

\textsuperscript{258} See Metzger, 80 Geo Wash L Rev at 1298–1310 (cited in note 96). At the same time, courts are “reluctant to be open about their use of common law in the administrative law arena.” Jack M. Beermann, \textit{Common Law and Statute Law in Administrative Law}, 63 Admin L Rev 1, 2–3 (2011).

\textsuperscript{260} See, for example, Bernick, 70 Admin L Rev at 809 & n 11 (cited in note 252) (providing examples). John Duffy started this trend, writing the first sustained attack on common law approaches to judicial review under the APA twenty years ago. See Duffy, 77 Tex L Rev at 120 (cited in note 259).

\textsuperscript{261} See, for example, Nicholas Bagley, \textit{The Puzzling Presumption of Reviewability}, 127 Harv L Rev 1285, 1287–89, 1303–09 (2014) (arguing that the APA’s text does not support the presumption of reviewability that the Court has identified and that the presumption illegitimately intrudes on congressional policy choices); Kathryn E. Kovacs, \textit{Superstatute Theory and Administrative Common Law}, 90 Ind L J 1207, 1254–60 (2015) (applying superstatute theory to the APA and critiquing administrative common law on public deliberation grounds).

\textsuperscript{262} See Sunstein, 107 Georgetown L J at 1642–57 (cited in note 194); see also Bagley, 127 Harv L Rev at 1287–89, 1303–09 (cited in note 261) (arguing that APA textualism and originalism lead to greater agency freedom from intrusive judicial review).

\textsuperscript{264} Metzger, 80 Geo Wash L Rev at 1355 (cited in note 96).
approach to the APA. The APA’s text often supports alternative readings, as made clear by the dueling accounts of §706 in Kisor and the strong and weak forms of arbitrary and capriciousness review in Department of Commerce. Moreover, the original meaning of the APA was and remains contested. 265 George Shepherd has described “the fight over the APA” as “a pitched political battle for the life of the New Deal.” This battle meant that key provisions of the APA were left intentionally ambiguous so that agreement on the APA could be reached. And it meant that the APA’s legislative history was intentionally manipulated by both sides to advance their cause, leaving contradictory sources for future interpreters. 266 One clear data point, however, is that the Supreme Court never viewed the APA as overturning administrative common law or its judicial review precedents, other than imposing a more searching version of substantial evidence review. 267

As important, administrative common law is an inevitable and legitimate phenomenon in our constitutional separation of powers system. 268 It is inevitable given the difficulties Congress faces in legislating and the practical impossibility of specifying answers to newly emergent administrative law issues in advance. The result is that courts end up tasked with policing agency actions under statutory constraints that increasingly are out-of-step with administrative realities. Of course, courts could leave the necessary updating to Congress, and sometimes do. But experience shows that—at least with a capacious-ly-worded statute—courts feel a practical imperative to perform that updating role rather than simply apply administrative constraints ill-suited to serving congressional purposes in the face of changed realities. 269 Administrative law’s trans-substantive nature, which means that the effects of not gapfilling or updating would mean inadequate administrative controls across a wide range of executive branch activities, reinforces judges’ inclinations for common-law development. A similar reinforcing effect comes from administrative law’s focus on the structures and procedures that lie at the heart of the administrative state, such as the court-agency relationship. Not only is this relationship difficult to capture comprehensively in statutes, 270 but courts may view elaboration of judicial review doctrines as especially within their bailiwick.

This structural character of administrative law closely relates to a third feature that underlies the development of administrative common law: the quasi-constitutional character of ordinary administrative law. Administrative law plays a critical role in building out the administrative state, and even more in domesticating the administrative state within the 265 For a detailed articulation of this view with respect to § 706, see Sunstein, 107 Georgetown L J at 1642–57 (cited in note 194).

266 George B. Shepherd, Fierce Compromise: The Administrative Procedure Act Emerges from New Deal Politics, 90 Nw U L Rev 1557, 1560, 1662–63 (1996) (“As the bill’s enactment become imminent, each party to the negotiations over the bill attempted to create legislative history—to create a record that would cause future reviewing courts to interpret the new statute in a manner that would favor the party.”).
267 See Sunstein, 107 Georgetown L J at 1653–56 (cited in note 194) (discussing the Court’s adherence to such as Gray v Powell, 314 US 402 (1941) and NLRB v Hearst Publications, 322 US 111 (1944)); Green, Deconstructing at 134–38 (cited in note 232).
268 This paragraph and the next draws on ideas I set out at length in Metzger, 80 Geo Wash L Rev at 1320 (cited in note 96).
269 A prime example is judicial development and elaboration of judicial review of rulemaking in the face of the explosion of social regulation in the 1960s and 1970s. See Robert L. Rabin, Federal Regulation in Historical Perspective, 38 Stan L Rev 1189, 1301–09 (1986).
Although rarely judicially acknowledged, the primary means by which courts have addressed constitutional concerns about agencies’ powers has been through subconstitutional administrative law requirements, such as the requirement of reasoned decisionmaking, rather than direct constitutional scrutiny.\textsuperscript{271} Judicial development of administrative common law reflects this use of administrative law to address the constitutional tensions raised by the modern administrative state.

To be sure, that administrative common law may be practically inevitable does not render it legitimate. But unlike earlier instances of federal court lawmaking, administrative common law does not displace state law or alter the primary rules that govern private behavior. Instead, it shares the focus on uniquely federal interests that marks many legitimate forms of federal common law.\textsuperscript{272} Equally central, most administrative common law has a statutory basis to which it is at least loosely tethered, such as the judicial review provisions of the APA. And, critically, to the extent it serves to implement separation of powers concerns, administrative common law is part of the elaboration of constitutional requirements seen as lying at the core of the judicial role today.

III. Whither Roberts Court Administrative Law?

Focusing simply these analytic themes and tensions, it is hard to discern a clear direction for the Roberts Court on administrative law. The Court is at times formalist and at times nonformalist; at times textualist and at times more common law in orientation. And while its administrative law opinions have turned consistently more historicist over recent years, that backwards focus has encompassed a range of approaches, from originalism to an emphasis on historical practice and precedent. Greater coherence becomes apparent when the justices are viewed in their overall ideological groupings, and some individual justices are particularly consistent. But the Court as a whole seems to vacillate in ways that resist principle explanation. Instead, the factor that best explains Roberts Court administrative law seems to be the varied administrative law jurisprudence of Chief Justice Roberts himself.

Taking a step back, two broader frames emerge from the 2018 Terms decisions and the Roberts Court’s administrative law jurisprudence writ large. One is radical and could portend dramatic changes in existing doctrine, the other is incrementalist and seemingly more modulated in its reforms. The incrementalist approach dominated the 2018 Term administrative law decisions and there are reasons to think that may continue. But although these two approaches are analytically distinct, in practice both may result in similar pullbacks on administrative authority. Moreover, both frames are united in one key regard: increasing judicial supervision of administrative government. And both convey the sense that the administrative state must be cabinied to guard against unaccountable, aggrandized, and arbitrary administrative power. Notably absent across both is an affirmative argument for the potential benefits of administrative government, other than recognition on the incrementalist side of the value of bureaucratic expertise.

\textsuperscript{271} For further development of this argument, see generally Gillian E. Metzger, \textit{Ordinary Administrative Law as Constitutional Common Law}, 110 Colum L Rev 479 (2010); see also Emily S. Bremer, \textit{The Unwritten Administrative Constitution}, 66 Fla L Rev 1217, 1218–19, 1234–48 (2014) (arguing that “administrative law has evolved into an unwritten constitution that governs the administrative power not contemplated by the U.S. Constitution”). To Justice Gorsuch’s credit, he acknowledged the role that subconstitutional doctrines play in policing discretion in \textit{Gundy}, 139 S Ct at 2141–42 (Gorsuch, J, dissenting) (discussing vagueness and major questions doctrines as surrogates for delegation doctrine).

The lack of a more robust defense of the administrative state represents a substantial hole in Roberts Court administrative law jurisprudence. Failure to invoke the full range of potential benefits from administrative governments makes Roberts Court administrative law jurisprudence appear increasingly one-sided and political. Moreover, a fuller picture of administrative government is needed if the Roberts Court’s interventions are to yield a coherent approach to administrative law.

A. Radicalism and Incrementalism in Roberts Court Administrative Law

Viewing the analytic tensions described above in a broader perspective, two methodological frames emerge from the Roberts Court’s 2018 administrative law decisions. What stands out in Justice Gorsuch’s Kisor opinion is the absolutist and categorical nature of his argument. He insists on the need for clear rules and rejects altogether any claims of stare decisis. A similar absolutist and categorical character typifies Gorsuch’s approach in Gundy, with his insistence on reviving direct constitutional barriers to delegation and unwillingness to address delegation concerns through more indirect and subconstitutional means. This uncompromising commitment to formalism, originalism, and textualism—evident in Justice Thomas’s opinions as well—has potential to radically reshape existing doctrine and administrative institutions. It would require overruling Chevron and Auer deference, as both justices openly acknowledge, but the implications of this approach would extend well past deference doctrines. Taken categorically, without acceptance of patterns of governance that have emerged over time, a formalist insistence on strict lines divide legislative, executive, and judicial power calls into question the combination of rulemaking, enforcement, and adjudication that lies at the heart of modern administrative agencies. Applying such a division, Gorsuch’s and Thomas’s prior opinions have suggested they would pull administrative adjudication back to only covering matters of public right, defined in originalist terms. Asserting that original understandings so require, they would also deem a broad swath of federal government personnel to be principal or inferior officers, thereby rendering a large number unconstitutionally appointed. Meanwhile, requiring the APA to be applied in accordance with its enacted text and original meaning would not just overturn Chevron and Auer and entail a pullback in arbitrariness review; it would also throw into doubt longstanding doctrines 273 Compare Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2443–48 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment) (arguing that stare decisis does not require retention of Auer), with Perez, 135 S Ct at 1212 (Scalia, J, concurring in the judgment) (acknowledging that Chevron may be too established to be overturned).

275 See Oil States Energy Services, LLC v Greene’s Energy Group, LLC, 138 S Ct 1365, 1381–82 (2018) (Gorsuch, J, dissenting) (arguing that system for administrative review of granted patents was unconstitutional because granted patents were not considered matters of public right at the founding); B&B Hardware, Inc v Hargis Industries, Inc, 135 S Ct 1293, 1316 (2015) (Thomas, J, dissenting) (“Because federal administrative agencies are part of the Executive Branch, it is not clear that they have power to adjudicate claims involving core private rights.”).
276 See Lucia v SEC, 138 S Ct 2044, 2056 (2018) (Thomas, J, concurring) (“The Founders likely understood the term ‘Officers of the United States’ to encompass all federal civil officials who perform an ongoing, statutory duty—no matter how important or significant the duty.”) (citation omitted).
developing the procedural requirements of notice and comment rulemaking and access to judicial review.277

By contrast, Justice Kagan’s Kisor opinion is above all else incrementalist. Far from absolute, it instead emphasizes case-by-case analysis and a commitment to developing precedent and existing practice rather than dramatic change. Such contextualized, precedent and practice-based analysis has long characterized Justice Breyer’s administrative law opinions.278 And incrementalism was also on display in Justice Kagan’s decision in Lucia v SEC, which ruled that ALJs at the Securities and Exchange Commission were unconstitutionally appointed inferior officers. In so holding, Kagan wrote about as narrowly as possible, closely following existing precedent and refusing to define inferior officer more broadly or consider the scope of the judges’ removal protection.279 Perhaps more importantly given his role as the fulcrum of the Court on administrative law, Chief Justice Roberts’s administrative law opinions are often incrementalist as well. Although the Chief Justice has advanced formalist principles with a categorical edge, he has applied them in a minimalist manner that substantially circumscribes their impact.280 Roberts’s penchant for minimalism was particularly clear with his limited and selective join in Kisor, which left the law versus policy and APA debates in the case unresolved and instead focused on addressing his concerns about Auer deference with minimal disruption to existing doctrine.

In the contest between radicalism and incrementalism during the 2018 Term, incrementalism was the victor. This could in part be a reflection of the fact that the 2018 Term was a transition year, with Justice Kennedy’s resignation and Justice Kavanaugh replacing him to create a solid conservative majority on the Court. Popular criticism of the Court in response may have made Roberts in particular unwilling to adopt more radical positions, and fears that the new majority will overturn contentious precedents fueled the repeated debates over stare decisis.281 If this pattern continues, then the most radical attacks on the constitutionality of administrative governance may not gain majority support.

The counter is Gundy and the constitutionality of broad congressional delegations of authority to the executive branch. Despite his incrementalism elsewhere, the Chief Justice signed onto Justice Gorsuch’s constitutional attack on broad delegations of authority to the executive branch in Gundy—an attack that Justice Kagan described as meaning that “most of Government is unconstitutional.”282 Each of the five conservative justices has now signaled willingness to reconsider the Court’s lenient nondelegation doctrine.283 Were the Court to support significant 277 See note 252 and its accompanying text (discussing arbitrary and capriciousness review); American Radio Relay League v FCC, 524 F3d 227, 245–47 (DC Cir 2008) (Kavanaugh, J, concurring) (arguing that current notice and comment requirements are not compatible with the APA’s text as originally understood).

279 Lucia, 138 S Ct at 2051 (Kagan, J) (“The sole question here is whether the Commission’s ALJs are “Officers of the United States” or simply employees of the Federal Government.”) (emphasis added).
282 139 S Ct at 2130 (Kagan, J) (plurality).
283 See id at 2131 (Gorsuch, J, joined by Roberts, CJ, and Thomas, J, dissenting) (arguing for stricter constitutional limits on delegation); id at 2131 (Alito, J, concurring in the judgment) (signaling support for reconsidering “the constitutional barriers to delegation, that would be a sign of radicalism ascendant in Roberts Court administrative law. However, it remains to be seen how far Roberts, Alito, and Kavanaugh are actually willing to go reviving limits on delegation. Their same-term endorsement of broad executive branch policy discretion in Department of Commerce may signal that they will not go very far. Previously, both Roberts and Kavanaugh have addressed excessive delegation concerns through a statutory interpretation lens rather than broadscale constitutional invalidation, and they may opt to continue with such subconstitutional approaches going forward.284

Chief Justice Roberts’s past practice of building up to overruling precedents over time rather than in one fell swoop also merits note.285 This might suggest that radical changes in administrative law may yet occur, notwithstanding the 2018 term’s incrementalism. Yet Roberts has had opportunities to push for more radical administrative law outcomes in the past and not pursued them—despite describing administrative government in stark terms that would seem to merit a more dramatic response.286 Put differently, when it comes to bottom line results, Roberts’s anti-administrativism has often lost out to his Burkean and common law instincts.

Crucially, however, even incrementalism can have a significant impact on existing administrative law and administrative institutions. One need look no further than the aftermath of Kisor to see this effect. In the four-month period after Kisor’s issuance, the courts of appeals directly considered whether to apply Auer deference in light of Kisor in thirty cases and deferred to the agency’s approach in only ten of those. In an additional five cases, the court declined deference but ultimately upheld the agency’s interpretation, for an overall rate of the government prevailing 50% of the time.287 By comparison, studies of the years leading up to Kisor have identified the courts as granting Auer deference or the government as prevailing 71% of the time.288 Similarly, despite their bottom-line minimalism, the Court’s decisions on removal, the status of approach we have taken [to nondelegation] for the past 84 years”); Paul v United States, 140 S Ct 342 (2019) (Kavanaugh, J, statement on denial of certiorari) (“Justice Gorsuch’s scholarly analysis of the Constitution’s nondelegation doctrine . . . may warrant further consideration in future cases.”).

284 See King v Burwell, 135 S Ct 2480, 2483 (2015) (refusing to apply Chevron deference on the grounds that “had Congress wished to assign” “a question of deep ‘economic and political significance’” to an agency “it surely would have done so expressly”); United States Telecommunications Association v FCC, 855 F3d 381, 419 (Kavanaugh, J, dissenting from denial of en banc review) (arguing that for an agency to have authority to issue a “major agency rule[] of great economic and political significance . . . Congress must clearly authorize the agency to do so”). Kavanaugh has noted that Gorsuch’s view would preclude the approach that Kavanaugh had previously articulated, of allowing Congress to delegate authority to an agency “to decide [a] major policy question” if Congress does so “expressly and specifically.” Paul, 140 S Ct at *1.

285 For a discussion of Chief Justice Roberts’s minimalism in this vein, see generally Jamal Greene, Maximinimalism, 38 Cardozo L Rev 623 (2016).

286 See Metzger, 131 Harv L Rev at 36, 47–48 (cited in note 11).

287 These numbers come from examining court of appeals and district court cases in the Westlaw citing decisions database that cited Kisor between June 26, 2019 to October 26, 2019. A total of 62 cases cited Kisor, but only 30 directly considered whether to apply Auer deference.

45
administrative law judges, and the constitutionality of administrative adjudication have sparked a slew of challenges to well-established features of the administrative state. And if widespread, statutory narrowing of delegated authority in response to background delegation concerns could lead to a significant pullback in agency authority. Hence, over time both the radical and incrementalist approaches may yield substantial change to existing administrative law.

A final important factor determining the shape of administrative law going forward is what happens in the federal appellate courts. That is the level where most administrative law decisions are issued, and where the ultimate impact of the Court’s interventions will be determined. Chevron is the leading example; more than the decision itself, it was subsequent actions by lower courts and Justice Scalia that made Chevron canonical. Similarly, it will be how the lower courts apply Kisor—whether they continue to treat it as significantly narrowing but preserving Auer, or instead as essentially doing away with Auer deference or only tweaking Auer at the margins—that will establish Kisor’s impact on administrative law in practice. The same is true of Department of Commerce’s emphasis on weaker arbitrary and capriciousness review of agency decisionmaking. As a result, the Trump Administration’s efforts to stock the federal courts with anti-administrativist judges may well prove more important than Supreme Court doctrine in transforming the shape of administrative law.

B. Constraining the Administrative State

It is also worth highlighting a central feature that, despite their differences, the radical and incrementalist approaches share: Both involve an assertion of greater judicial control over the administrative state and justify that greater role for courts on concerns about the dangers of expanding administrative power. Indeed, skepticism about administrative government may well be the consistent driver animating Roberts Court administrative law, albeit given full sway under Justice Gorsuch’s radicalism and tamped down under Justice Kagan’s incrementalism.

A striking characteristic of many Roberts Court administrative law opinions is their sharp rhetorical attack on the administrative state and bureaucracy. Chief Justice Roberts deserves the top award for the most pointed prose in this regard. His reference in Free Enterprise to a “vast and varied federal bureaucracy” that “wields vast power and touches almost every aspect of daily life” is a prime example, and his description in City of Arlington v FCC of “hundreds of federal agencies poking into every nook and cranny of daily life” is equally evocative. Several other justices have made disparaging remarks about the bureaucracy as well, often quoting Roberts’s language in Free Enterprise. Justice Gorsuch in particular repeatedly positions judges as the 289 See, for example, Seila Law LLC v Consumer Protection Bureau, 2019 WL 5281290 at 1 (US Oct 18, 2019) (asking the parties to address the severability of the CFPB from Dodd-Frank should it be found unconstitutional); Arthrex, Inc v Smith & Nephew, Inc, 2019 WL 5616010, 1 (Fed Cir 2019) (holding that Administrative Patent Judges were improperly appointed principal officers); Collins v Mnuchin, 938 F3d 553, 563 (5th Cir 2019) (en banc) (holding that the FHFA “for cause” removal protection was unconstitutional); Cochran v SEC, 2019 WL 1359252, at 1 (ND Tex 2019) (up on appeal before the 5th Circuit) (challenging the constitutionality of the SEC’s ALJ’s removal protection. The 5th Circuit issued a preliminary injunction on the administrative proceedings until the case is resolved).

---

protectors of “the unpopular and vulnerable” against “bureaucrats” and “a bureaucrat’s caprice.”

He echoed these sentiments to some extent in Kisor, invoking the administrative state’s “explosive growth,” and “self-interested” bureaucrats with shifting whims.

But the 2018 Term decisions were relatively tame and balanced on the rhetorical front, with Chief Justice Roberts in particular holding his fire. Perhaps the attacks on the “deep state” that currently dominate the political arena convinced the justices that similar bureaucracy bashing by the Court would be inappropriate.

Instead, what surfaced clearly in the 2018 Term opinions was a more principled debate over the relevance of bureaucratic expertise. As noted above, both Justice Kagan in Kisor and Justice Breyer in Department of Commerce portrayed expertise as a central benefit of administrative government and one that administrative law doctrine should be tailored to foster. Thus, Kagan precluded Auer deference from applying to administrative interpretations of regulations that did not “in some way implicate its substantive expertise” while Breyer relied heavily on the contrary and documented views of agency experts in concluding that Ross’s decision was arbitrary and capricious.

By contrast, Justice Gorsuch elevated judicial expertise over that of bureaucrats, arguing that it was ultimately for courts to weigh “the expert agency’s views” against “competing expert and other evidence supplied in an adversarial setting.” And Chief Justice Roberts insisted on the primacy of an agency’s political officials over its experts, emphasizing that agency decisions are legitimately driven by political priorities. This is a point Roberts has made before, most notably arguing in Free Enterprise that “[o]ne can have a government that functions without being ruled by functionaries, and a government that benefits from expertise without being ruled by experts.”

Justice Thomas also has voiced skepticism of arguments for deference based on administrative expertise, identifying them as misplaced and historically rooted in the progressives’ “belief that bureaucrats might more effectively govern the country than the American people.”

Yet these disagreements over bureaucratic expertise should not obscure the similarities in these accounts. All the justices ended up supporting greater judicial scrutiny of administrative decisionmaking in some form, whether by restricted deference to agency interpretations, heightened scrutiny of agency policy determinations, or both. As significant, they did so invoking the need to guard against the danger of excessive administrative power. Even Justice Kagan in Kisor argued “that administrative law doctrines must take account of the far-reaching influence of agencies and the opportunities such power carries for abuse.”

Granted, what the justices view as the danger posed by expanded administrative government varies in important ways. As I have previously argued, at times justices stress the danger of aggrandized administrative power threatening individual liberty, at others the fear is that administrative power is politically unaccountable. In Department of Commerce Justice Breyer suggested a different account, implying that the real danger was too much political control of administrative power, while the Chief Justice focused on the traditional concern that exercised of administrative power must be reasoned and not arbitrary. And in Kisor and Gundy, Justice Gorsuch repeatedly portrayed administrative power as biased as well as aggrandized, worsening the threat to individual liberty.

Despite these differences, the consistent theme is of the potential dangers of administrative government.

Notably lacking from the 2018 Term decisions, and from Roberts Court administrative law generally, is a robust defense of the administrative state. The contribution that bureaucratic expertise makes to better decisionmaking and effective government is a central benefit of administrative agencies. But administrative agencies serve other critical functions too. Bureaucracy works to constrain as well as empower government, through close supervision and enforcement of legal controls on government actors. Administrative government is also essential for ensuring political accountability; it is agencies implementing statutes through regulations and enforcement that put democratically adopted policy into operation. And administrative agencies are equally important to securing individual liberty, by protecting individuals against abuses of private power and ensuring access to the basic goods (safe food, a clean environment, protection against private exploitation, and so on) needed for a full and free life. The D.C. Circuit underscored this point recently in its en banc majority opinion in PHH Corporation v CFPB. There, in rejecting the claim that a single-headed agency with removal protection posed a greater threat to individual liberty than a multi-member commission, Judge Pillard emphasized the liberty benefits of financial regulation:

It remains unexplained why we would assess the challenged removal restriction with reference to the liberty of financial providers, and not more broadly to the liberty of individuals and families who are their customers. … Congress understood that markets’ contribution to human liberty derives from freedom of contract, and that such freedom depends on market participants’ access to accurate information, and on clear and reliably enforced rules against fraud and coercion.

---

301 Metzger, 131 Harv L Rev at 36–38 (cited in note 11).
302 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2589–90, 2592–93, 2595 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part).
303 Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2425, 2432, 2439, 2446–47 (Gorsuch, J, concurring in the judgment); Gundy, 139 S Ct at 2131 (Gorsuch, J, dissenting).
305 Metzger, 131 Harv L Rev at 77–87 (cited in note 11).
306 PHH Corp v Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, 881 F3d 75, 106 (DC Cir 2018) (en banc); see also id at 105–06 (arguing in addition that if “a removal restriction leaves the President adequate control of the executive branch’s functions,” courts do not undertake a separate inquiry into the restriction’s impact on liberty).

48
For that matter, financial regulation also advances liberty interests of regulated parties, for example by guarding against abusive tactics that can wreak financial havoc or destroy consumer trust in an industry.

What would a fuller defense of administrative government have looked like in the 2018 administrative law decisions? In Department of Commerce, more emphasis could have been put on how the Census Bureau’s actions represented an internal bureaucratic effort to reinforce democracy and the rule of law. Policysetting by top political appointees is certainly an important form of political accountability, as Chief Justice Roberts insisted. But there is surely also a political accountability benefit to resisting actions by political leaders that threaten the basic representative structure of our political system, as well as an important rule of law value in ensuring that political leaders do not abuse government power for partisan gain. In Kisor, it could have meant more of an argument for interpretive deference precisely because such deference allows agencies to interpret ambiguous regulations in ways that they believe will best advance their regulatory goals. Although for Gorsuch this amounts to self-serving and liberty-threatening bias, that assumes that public agencies are no different than private parties. A more robust defense of administrative government would reject that equation, and instead emphasize how effective implementation of statutes and regulations can be liberty enhancing and in the public interest. The same liberty-enhancing argument could have been developed in defense of broad delegations in Gundy; such delegations can enhance liberty by ensuring that government is able to respond quickly and effectively to new private abuses of power as they arise. In fairness, Justice Breyer’s and Kagan’s opinions hinted at these arguments, with Breyer mentioning the importance of an accurate census to democracy and Kagan underscoring agencies’ knowledge and value to Congress. But for the most part they emphasized neutral-sounding administrative expertise and did not develop a broader account of how the administrative state reinforces the constitutional order.

Failing to note these potential benefits leads to a one-sided portrayal of the administrative state as inherently a threat to democracy, rule of law, and liberty. And this one-sidedness in turn suggests that the ultimate goal of Roberts Court administrative law may be to pull back on government on ideological and political grounds, rather than because doing so advances constitutional values or some other principled basis. That perception should be a concern even for conservative justices who are deeply skeptical of administrative government. As important, a more balanced account of agencies’ strengths and weaknesses is needed for the Roberts Court to develop a coherent approach to administrative law. Absent a more sophisticated and nuanced understanding of administrative government, the Roberts Court’s administrative law decisions are unlikely to rise above the level of ad hoc and occasionally inconsistent interventions.

---

308 Department of Commerce, 139 S Ct at 2584-85, 2595 (Breyer, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part); Kisor, 139 S Ct at 2413 (Kagan, J) (plurality); Gundy, 139 S Ct at 2130 (Kagan, J) (plurality).